

UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA
AT LOS ANGELES

Digitized by the Internet Archive in 2008 with funding from Microsoft Corporation

THE HUMAN TRAGEDY

BY

ALFRED AUSTIN

WILLIAM BLACKWOOD AND SONS
EDINBURGH AND LONDON

MDCCCLXXVI

. 8 7 6

2420 (34.50. 1862)

77
40-2
282
TO

H. J. A.

THREE graces still attend me, since the day
Your step across my graceless threshold came :
Reverence, and Gratitude, and Love, their name.
Reverence, whose gaze fears from the ground to stray,
And bows its head, and sues to you to lay
Your foot thereon, and keep my base self down :
Next, Gratitude, that, bolder, by degrees
Creeps up the folds of wedlock's rescuing gown,
To make a circling fondness round your knees;
And lastly, Love, which from that low perch sees
Chaste lips, and tender eyes, and tresses brown,
And, darting upward, finds a home with these.
So stand we level in that high embrace,
And I have all your glory on my face.

ACT I.

ACT I.

PROTAGONIST:

LOVE.

PLACE:

ENGLAND.

TIME:

JUNE—NOVEMBER 1857.

THE HUMAN TRAGEDY.

ACT I.

I.

O LOVE, undying Love ! eternal Star,
That, risen ere the dawn of earthly suns,
Dost never set ! That, as now near, now far,
Its fickle course each paler passion runs,
Burnest on high, fixed where the Immortals are,
Beacon and bourne of us wayfaring ones !
Elder than all the Nine ! descend, and give
Soul to my strings, that they may breathe and live !

II.

For, and thou knowest if I boast or lie,
I through the years thy votary have been,
From the first tumult of the boyish sigh,
Till this ripe hour, when now I dwell serene,
Now and henceforth, in light that cannot die,
Poured from thy sphere, O Patroness and Queen !
Thou hast vouchsafed to make thy mysteries mine ;
And all my thoughts, prayers, gifts, are solely thine.

III.

Therefore this earthly strain, wherein are blent
Peace and unrest, meetings and partings dire,
Joy that consumes and never can content,
Passion and pain, despondency, desire,
And hope who weaves his own white cerement,
Do Thou with thine own virtue deign inspire ;
So that it foil fleet time's retreating dart,
And be enduring, even as Thou art !

IV.

Yet not of Love alone, its advent blind,
Swift raptures and slow penalties, I sing.
I must be lifted on a fiercer wind,
And from the lyre a louder anthem wring,
Still as Religion, Country, or Mankind,
Bids my weak hand sound more sonorous string.
Ah ! fatal four ! which by the dark decree
Of Heaven evolve the Human Tragedy !

V.

But Thee, O Love ! Thee sole of all the four,
I with bowed head and reverent heart invoke.
The patriot pulse mayhap shall throb no more,
Altars no more with rival incense smoke,
No more too sanguine souls deaf doom implore
To spare Humanity life's goad, death's yoke ;
Thou, though the spell of shrine, shore, world, should fade,
Thou wilt shine on, undimmed and undecayed !

VI.

Aid then Thy suppliant, Love divine ! for Thou
In youth's warm days didst generate this strain.
Longwhile it brooding slept : O quicken it now,
And give me soon fruition of my pain !
I do no longer sicken : on my brow,
And on my breast, a peace descends like rain,
And with death's eyes a fair strong child I see,
Which shall immortal as one parent be !

VII.

Nor do ye spurn or lightly turn away,
Whose living glance may light upon the page,
Because I tell a story of to-day,
And reap my harvest from the waving Age.
When ye and I are dumb and deaf for aye,
It may the young and glowing chance engage,
And all your honour in those days unborn
Will be, the poet was not paid with scorn.

VIII.

Rude Winter, violating neutral plain
Of March, through April's territory sallied,
Scoured with his snowy plumes May's smooth domain,
Then, down encamping, made his daring valid.
Nor till June, mustering all her gallant train
Of glittering spears, Spring's flying legions rallied,
Did the usurper from the realms of sleet
Fold his white tents, and shriek a wild retreat.

IX.

Then, all at once, the land laughed into bloom,
Feeling its alien fetters were undone ;
Rushed into frolic ecstasies ; the plume
The courtly lilac tosses i' the sun,
Laburnum tassels dripping faint perfume,
White thorn, pink blossoms, showed, not one by one,
But all in rival pomp and joint array,
Blent with green leaves as long delayed as they.

X.

The dog-rose, simplest, sweetest of its kind,
Brocaded every hedgerow ere as yet,
In tufted hollows screened from sun and wind,
The primrose paled and perished. The violet
Closed not blue eyes, to early doom resigned,
Ere it beheld the clambering woodbine wet
With honey self-distilled, and knew that earth
Would, spite its death, be sweet as at its birth.

XI.

And to its grassy grave with hasteful feet
Came the anemone, and o'er it flung,
In love but scarce in sorrow, such a sheet
Of pink-white petals as befits the young
Whose fair false hopes the kindly gods defeat :
While, following swift, the hyacinth upsprung
From the soft sod, and 'mong the sylvan shells
Thrust his bold stalk, and shook his scented bells.

XII.

The cuckoo, babbling egotist, from tree
To tree as with short restless wing he flew,
Called his own name, doubling the word for glee :
The stockdove murmured, the livelong day through,
Its one deep note of perched felicity ;
And the sweet bird to one sad memory true,
Finding e'en day for its laments too brief,
Charmed listening night with its melodious grief.

XIII.

No longer cowering 'neath the fleecy screen
Of their warm dams or bleating at the ills
Of unkind life and norland tempests' spleen,
Huddled the helpless lambs,—but skipped like rills,
Among the dykes and mounds of pastures green,
And orchards pranked with nodding daffodils ;
Frisked like young Loves, in ever-shifting ring,
Round the old boles flushed with the wine of Spring.

XIV.

A subtle glory crept from mead to mead,
Till they were burnished saffron to behold,
And from their wintry byres and dark sheds freed,
The musing kine lay couched on cloth of gold.
Abetted by the Spring, the humblest weed
Wore its own coronal, and gaily bold
Waved jewelled sceptre. Stirred by some strange power,
The very walls seemed breaking into flower.

XV.

And all throughout the air there reigned the sense
Of waking dream with luscious thoughts o'erladen,
Of joy too conscious made and too intense
By the swift advent of excessive Aiden :
Bewilderment of beauty's affluence,
Such as delights, though dangerous, man and maiden.
And then it was, by Heaven's despotic grace,
Godfrid first gazed on Olive's form and face.

XVI.

She was no goddess of majestic mould,
That drinks the homage of the fulsome crowd,
Mere marble flesh, voluptuously cold,
Swelling the showy trappings of the proud ;
One of those splendid idols, gorged with gold,
And fed on scented flattery's empty cloud,
Within whose hollow bosom fashion dwells,
False priest, and thence emits its oracles.

XVII.

She was an English maiden, unexiled
From that true Paradise, an English home,
Where fair Eve's fairer daughters, unbeguiled
By tree or subtle serpent, still may roam.
Evil and good she knew but as a child
Knows, when it haply reads in some old tome
Of gruesome deeds, and sheds its transient tears
O'er wrong it neither understands nor fears.

XVIII.

She had been cradled amid loveliest things,
And rocked to sweetest music. Scent of flowers,
Long dreamy lawns, and birds on happy wings,
Keeping their homes in never-rifled bowers,
Cool fountains filling with their murmurings
The sunny silence 'twixt the chiming hours,
Kind looks, and gentle voices,—these had made
The even world in which she lived and strayed :

XIX.

Had been her atmosphere, until it seemed
She in her being had absorbed them all ;
That from her very presence sunshine streamed,
And like the sound when silvery waters fall,
Rippled her voice ; that, when she passed, there gleamed
A light, as 'twere of lilies lithe and tall,
Swayed by the wind ; that music, colour, scent,
Had found, in her, complete embodiment.

XX.

Harsh words or cold she never heard nor spake,
But simple homage with frank smiles repaid,
And they who served her, served her for the sake
Of being near so fair and kind a maid.
E'en in brute beasts her coming seemed to wake
A human instinct : loud the stables neighed,
Hearing her footfall ; and the herds that fed,
Felt her afar, and trooped to greet her tread.

XXI.

Until she rose it did not seem the dawn.
The shaggy deerhound none could yet decoy
From where he lay long-stretched upon the lawn,
When she came forth, bounded and bayed for joy,
Then followed like her shade ; the orphan fawn,
To tempting palm and coaxing summons coy,
Came trotting through the dew at her command,
And laid its head beneath her lily hand.

XXII.

Fancy, to find her likeness, earth and skies
Would vainly sweep ; all paragons must fail.
For unto what would it compare her eyes?
Not unto violets ; for violets pale.
Her hair to golden daylight ? Daylight dies.
And, for her face, how would the rose avail
When the rose hangs its head and bends its stem ?—
Compare fair things to her, not her to them.

XXIII.

Such, and so guarded by benignant stars,
Was Olive, when that unknown factor, Fate,
Who e'en celestial calculation mars,
Made Godfrid guest within her father's gate :
Just when June, marching with her shimmering cars,
Drove Winter howling from the plains where late
He overawed the Spring, and had unfurled
His hoary usurpation o'er the world.

XXIV.

O thou dread planet, Opportunity !
Thou wayward moon of man's deep-moaning tides !
By whose incalculable law the sea
Of mortal passion surges or subsides !
Thou mistress absolute of all we be,
From the first moment when by purblind guides
Committed to the warm womb's fostering cave,
Till dropped into the cold ungrowing grave !

XXV.

Who says the Seasons change, nor haply knows
That to each change man's heart is still replying ?
That sweet shy Spring whose colour comes and goes,
That Summer in a golden languor lying,
Half-stifled by the smell of the musk-rose,
That Autumn of her hectic beauty dying,
And even Winter blowing through his hands
To thaw his veins, rule us with unseen bands ?

XXVI.

Had Godfrid first that happy threshold crossed
What time the robin pecks against the pane,
When dripping boughs bewep their beauty lost,
And furrowed fields lament the rifled grain,
Or e'en when curled by crisp October's frost,
The shivering leaves are blown aslant like rain,
He might have come and gone and left no trace
In Olive's heart, no shade on Olive's face.

XXVII.

Winter is ruled by male Divinities ;
But Summer, gentle Summer, owns the sway
Of that coequal sex whose mild decrees
All understanding souls love and obey.
And so it happed that ere by tame degrees
Of trite acquaintance broadening day by day,
Which disenchant the sense, till all seems known,
Godfrid and Olive walked the woods alone.

XXVIII.

And who amid June's world of fair and sweet,
Eglantined hedgerows, woodbine-scented air,
'To guide his novel footsteps was so meet
As Olive, queen of all things sweet and fair ?
Who knew so well the foxglove's cool retreat,
In what moist crevice hid the maidenhair,
Where piped the thristle loudest, or the sound
Of tunnel rippled silveriest underground ?

XXIX.

It seemed a realm where every flower and stem
Rose up her royal progress thus to greet,
That they her subjects were, and she to them
The fount of honour and of grace the seat.
The emulous meadows kissed her garments' hem,
And left their golden nectar on her feet ;
While choir on choir, each louder than the last,
Chanted her maiden praises as she passed.

XXX.

Yet not the extolling anthems trebly shrilled
By bright-plumed choristers in nooks o'erhead
Of Nature's florid aisles, nor flower-cups filled
With trembling wine, nor petalled carpets spread
Under her feet, nor incense straight distilled
From dripping brier, her praises sung or said
As loudly as his looks, who with curbed stride
And tell-tale eyes walked, silent, at her side.

XXXI.

Distinguished she a flower, he plucked it straight ;
And if she spied a rounded nest half hid
In forked spray, from which the fluttered mate
Had flown as they drew nigh, though still amid
Yet denser boughs its love-lord piped elate,
He, while she half abetted and half chid,
The curtain drew aside, for her to peep
Upon the warm close-nestled eggs, asleep.

XXXII.

Then, as she held her breath, and crosswise laid
An arrowy finger o'er a bow-shaped lip,
The leafy covering, careful, he remade,
Just as before, then soft away would slip.
When hark ! the cuckoo called ! Anew they stayed
Their steps, yet deeper of the sound to sip,
And gazed at one another with mute ken,
Until it should repeat the note again ;

XXXIII.

And then walked on, still hearing in their heart
Echo on echo of that joyous strain,
Which hath a sense of moisture, and seems part
Of childlike April's laughter-rippled rain ;
Which makes the soul to bud, the pulse to start,
The hackneyed heart youth's wonderland regain,
When, ere by passion parched, by grief turned sere,
Life warms 'neath smile or shimmers through a tear.

XXXIV.

Then would a freshet runnel cross their track,
Low-purling to itself for secret bliss,
Now pattering onwards, now half-turning back,
To give the smooth round pebbles one more kiss :
Here travelling straight as haste, there, with changed tack,
Meandering on in utter waywardness.
Now diving under tangled grass, and then
With frolic laugh bubbling to sight again.

XXXV.

Whereat they stopped afresh, for him to say :
" Shall we not hearken to its musings bland ?
For Nature hath a gift of tongues, which they Alone who heed the Spirit understand.
Sometimes I hope I am not wholly clay,
And you, meseems, are of the chosen band."
Attentive then they drank its teachings clear,
Seeming to listen with the selfsame ear.

XXXVI.

But what it spake, neither nor said nor asked,
But on a seat, 'neath a full-blossomed thorn,
One bunch of whiteness, that had vainly tasked
The painter's art and put his boast to scorn,
Olive the guide, they sate them down and basked
In shaded sunshine of the mounting morn,
And knew, by silence dropped on bush and brake,
'Twas noon, when birds their wise siesta take.

XXXVII.

And they grew silent too, till with a smile
He turned and said : " Now, do not laugh nor scoff !
But will you graciously sit here awhile,
And let me stand a little further off ? "
He spoke so simply, so exempt from guile,
She, guileless, did his hest. " And, pray you, doff
That churlish hat, and leave your forehead bare,
So that the shadows fall upon your hair !

XXXVIII.

" Yes, yes, like that ! Now, on my word, you make
A monstrous pretty picture, thorn and you !
Wherein we see full many a hanging flake
Of Winter living within Summer's hue.
How strange it seems the thorn should neither shake
Its snowy plumage down and o'er you strew
A white cold sheet, nor in the radiant glare
You shed, should melt, leaving its branches bare ! "

XXXIX.

Then to the rustic seat beneath the thorn,
Which overhung them with its bleached hood,
Returning: "They are right, though sophists scorn,
Who say that Beauty is the chiefest good.
For Truth still leaves its votaries forlorn,
And Virtue hides within a tangled wood,
Which, as one pushes on, yet denser grows.
Beauty alone hath fulness and repose."

XL.

"O no!" she said, "it is a little thing,
And to be strong and manful is the best:
Beauty is queen, but Valour still is king,
Mere consort she, but he the lord confessed.
Her fulness and repose from this but spring,—
She holds so little; but his large unrest
Life's arduous heights still climbs, nor ever stops,
Like the young sun shouldering the mountain tops."

XLI.

"Yours sounds the nobler doctrine," he replied,
"And fits you well, though mine saves honour too.
But words for ever of the mark fly wide,
And language makes that false which thought left true."
"Then let us call wise silence to our side,"
With laughing lids she said, "to find the clue
To that agreeing ground where creeds that jar
Upon the lips, the mind's twin-brothers are."

XLII.

“Nay, if you thus discourse, I ’d have you talk
Till the high fervid sun shall yield the sky
To the mild lustre of the milky walk.”
Whereat the laughter faded from her eye ;
And like two flowers upon a single stalk,
Fed by one hidden root, they secretly
Drank the same thoughts, same feelings, as same air,
And, without looking, knew each other there.

XLIII.

He was of open mien and virile guise,
In manhood fully blossomed, as are those,
Reared by the tarrying Northland’s seasoning skies,
When their fifth lustre draweth just to close.
Of that hard-wooded stock time checks and tries,
Whose fibre slowly unto ripeness grows,
But, once matured, withstands the storms or drouth
That wreck the hasty saplings of the South !

XLIV.

Of famous loins and suckled on renown,
He found the lists of life no more on fire
With pluméd knights who tilted for the crown
Of beauty’s smile and the embalming lyre ;
But choked by jostling crowds that, grovelling down,
Scrambled for golden garbage in the mire ;
With clownish weapons fought, and struck foul blow,
And when one tripped the other, chuckled low.

XLV.

All, all were there ; not they alone deemed base,
But they who sooth themselves still noble called,
Battling with tooth and claw to near the place
Whereon those others thickest knelt and sprawled.
Some few there were who, with exultant face,
Laden with booty from the fight had crawled,
And thenceforth ate and slept with careless breast :
And these were deeply honoured by the rest.

XLVI.

From this ignoble rage he stood aside,
In pity, saved by wisdom from contempt,
And, conscious though of power, with modest pride
From base contentions held himself exempt.
The younger scion of a house that vied
With kings in that sole wealth which once could tempt
The lordly temper, yet in all else pinched,
He faced a rich world poor, nor ever flinched.

XLVII.

Unto the ancient Faith his folk had clung,
When Reason chimed with passion to unbind
The folds in which, while yet its limbs were young,
Fond nurse Authority had swathed mankind.
Withal 'twas whispered by the curious tongue
He had, himself, of late unsewed his mind,
But, out of courtesy, and since the goal
Uncertain seems, in peace possessed his soul.

XLVIII.

And thus he was as one who, leaving sleep,
Rises before the world is yet awake,
And listening, hears no sound, except the cheep
Of eave-hung nest, or chirrup in the brake,
But watching still the East, beholds dawn creep
Mute on the darkness, and though clouds o'ertake
Its first faint feet, and mists its steps delay,
Smiles in his heart to think 'twill soon be day.

XLIX.

But now nor haughty grief that his own life
Had from the sheath of nothingness been flashed
In swinish days vacant of vital strife,
Nor those sharp doubts by which the soul is gashed
And left to bleed by a self-wielded knife,
No, nor those communings wherein are dashed
Future 'gainst present, present against past,
Ruffled his heart, where all fair things seemed glassed.

L.

The gloomy spectres which we cannot slay,
Yet from his mind, this morn, as glideth shade
Swift 'fore the sun, had subtly slipped away,
Chased by the glamour of this glowing maid.
He but beheld a form, fresh as young May,
Lips budding, cheeks full-bloomed and undecayed,
And blue eyes crowned by radiant aureole,
Like violets wild under a primrose knoll.

LI.

Contentious thought, whose heaving influence
Lifts up the waves of being, did subside
Unto that sea of pleasurable sense,
Whereon dim dreams like snow-white vessels glide,
Going we know not where, nor coming whence,
And gazing on whose shimmer, vacant-eyed,
We feel our waking will grow less and less,
Till our lids droop in divine drowsiness.

LII.

To him was woman's loveliness the sum
Of all divine perceptions 'neath earth's dome.
The smell of tasselled larch-woods, and the hum
Of happy bee bearing its honey home,
The cascade's plash, the breezes crisp that come
From unguessed lands on backs of bounding foam ;
These, to his sense, but wandering portions were
Of rounded beauty, centred all in Her.

LIII.

And when his eyes the radiance could perceive
Of such, it moved him like a dewy star
That tingles on the high calm brow of eve,
It would be far too gross to wish less far !
And with whose lot we but aspire to weave
The thoughts and feelings which the deepest are
In the unfathomable soul, and do
Alone feed hope that we are heavenly too.

LIV.

But these are thoughts which but in solitude
Rear their shy heads, and crouch when more are near.
And, as they wandered on through mead and wood,
No deeper sense disturbed him than how dear
It was to rove with one so fair and good,
So bland of speech, so affable of ear,
So young, so gracious, upon whom the skies
Rained every dewy gift of Paradise.

LV.

To them it was as though June ne'er before
Had filled her lap with roses ; as though now
Did merle first sing and skylark rippling soar,
And wren and blackcap glance from bough to bough.
The daisy's frill a wondrous newness wore,
And childlike marvel puckered up their brow,
When from deep banks, with tangled tussocks heaped,
The roguish periwinkle, laughing, peeped.

LVI.

When with staid mothers' milk and sunshine warmed,
The pasture's frisky innocents bucked up,
Flush from the ground, or, on smooth hillock swarmed,
With hornless fronts each other 'gan to tup,
That frolic sight their eyes as freshly charmed,
As though ne'er carved on many an antique cup,
Nor time on time, when men and Gods were young,
By the pastoral Muse o' the sweet Sicilian sung.

LVII.

Ah ! Time ! Thou cruel foe, and doubtful friend !
Thou that dost make all sweet things to begin,
With equal stride bring'st all sweet things to end.
No fabled phœnix thou, thou from within
Thine own cold ashes still dost reascend,
Unto thyself sole heritor and kin ;
To whom we aliens are, whose joy or grief
But lends thy long monotony relief.

LVIII.

So them, whom the kind morn together brought
And knit with links of Nature's subtle art,
By no third breath divided or distraught,
The eve unkindly worse than thrust apart ;
Conjoining with them tongues, disowned, unsought,
Whose foreign accents jar the home-sick heart,
Making it inly fretful, and more yearn
The shy secluded hours would swift return.

LIX.

And they returned, when on the hawthorn spray
The covert nightingale unceasing sang
Sweet trouble that but fitful broke by day,
And every copse with argute anguish rang.
The moon came up and took her trackless way,
Pale as when first she heard the love-bird's pang,
Pale with a sorrow of her own untold,
Found it a voice, perchance were half consoled !

LX.

Then, with no other nigh them or between,
Their prompt excuse the night's resplendent vault,
Olive and Godfrid in the dewy sheen
Stepped forth, unmindful of fair Eden's fault ;
And 'neath a flowering chesnut's moonlit screen,
'Gainst a white gateway leaning, made they halt ;
Standing as close as they whom something draws
On towards the edge of life's forbidding laws ;

LXI.

And who would be still nearer, since as yet
Even the pandar palms apart remain,
And feel within their veins the electric jet,
Currents of strangely pleasurable pain,
Which through the heart's too narrow channels fret,
Hurrying towards Love's immeasurable main ;
Which reached, they fain would backward turn their course,
And with vain tides moan their for aye lost source.

LXII.

But they were still among the freshet rills
That feed Love's tragic river ; and the call
Of nightingale to nightingale, in trills
That lived upon each other, like a tall
And many-plashing fountain that refills
Its silvery jets with silvery jets that fall,
Seemed to speak all their thinking, and impart
What was yet inarticulate in their heart.

LXIII.

Thus in the leafy moonshine hushed they stood,
Their entranced souls surrendered to the night,
Deep drinking of unmoralizèd good
From the clear founts of beauty and delight.
And when some throat its wistful treble would
Prolong, it seemed, beyond e'en music's might,
They listened with eyes that met, till the slow strain
Quick quavered down the sharp descents of pain.

LXIV.

Grief that is sweetly sung is scarcely grief.
There is a power in music to distil
An aromatic dew from the sere leaf,
And drain the bitterness from deepest ill.
It is a kind and unsuspected thief,
Who robs our hearts with such consummate skill,
We miss not what is taken, and conceive,
While grief is charmed, we but more keenly grieve.

LXV.

And e'en to those through whose untutored veins
Youth and young joy, in innocent excess,
Exult and riot, music's cunning strains
Lend a delicious and divine distress ;
Bringing the callow soul not sorrow's pains,
But a vague sense of sorrow's nobleness ;
By a dim copy training it to know,
Long ere they come, the face and port of woe.

LXVI.

Thus steeped in luscious sadness, unexpressed
Save by joint silence, back they turned, alas !
Home from the shrubbery's many a tuneful nest,
By twinkling gravel skirting shimmering grass.
Then Olive, folded to her father's breast
An instant, like an image from a glass,
Vanished,—and all seemed blank : though Godfrid's host
With kindly talk swift filled the vacant post.

LXVII.

He could not vaunt, bequeathed to him from yore,
A knightly name, in sooth a dubious boast,
Now when the knightly scutcheon glows no more,
And knightly honour stalks a nerveless ghost.
His sires had wrung from ransacked sea and shore
The guerdon modern glory covets most,
Wealth, with wealth's crowning symbol, once the spoil
Of faithful swords, a hold upon the soil.

LXVIII.

And 'mong his sylvan acres, loosed from care,
He led the free and philosophic life
Denied to those poor straws of fate, who share
The Court's mean pomp or Senate's frothy strife ;
Constant at covert, Sessions, house of prayer,
To that true household god, a helpful wife,
Left gracious hearth and hospitable shelf,
And loved his neighbour almost as himself.

LXIX.

But deeper, tenderer, prompter far than all
The homage lent to duty, wife, or friend,
Was that paternal fondness, at whose call
Men's slowly stiffening bosoms once more bend.
He was to Olive subject, servant, thrall,
And she to him beginning, centre, end
Of every leisured thought ; his joy, his rest,
The sunny fulness of his vacant breast.

LXX.

And Olive's was a heart which back to love
Turns as a flower will turn to warmth and light ;
And on the perch of home, even as a dove
Upon one bough, with never a thought of flight,
Heedless of all beyond it or above,
Will sit and coo from morning unto night,
So stayed contented, happy,—unaware
That earth held ought or larger or more fair.

LXXI.

But as there lies a deep and dewy cell
I' the most open flower, that yields the sweet,
Stored in its virgin coy receptacle,
Neither to parent sun nor fostering heat,
But guards it close, till on the fragrant bell
Some child of air, with wandering wings and feet,
Settling to sip, delighted on shall press,
And boldly rifle its last lusciousness ;

LXXII.

So in the heart e'en of the frankest maid
That ever nestled at a father's knee,
Hearkened a mother's precepts unafraid,
And slept unweaned from home felicity,
Dwells a dim nook not parents' feet invade,
No tongue may violate, no eye can see,
Till some strange wanderer, sent by Heaven, shall dive,
And suck the secret of that honeyed hive !

LXXIII.

And thus within fair Olive's filial breast
There was another Olive, unallowed
To outer gaze, and by herself but guessed
Dimly, as by deep lake a fleecy cloud :
Olive that trembled, yet to none confessed
That she had trembled, when her lids were bowed
Over some poet's page which freshly told
The old, old story, that is never old !

LXXIV.

But at no other than the rainbow tale
Which tearful fancy weaves, had Olive yet
Felt the pulse quicken and the cheek grow pale ;
No voice had heard, to mesh her like a net,
No touch had known, to thrill her like a wail,
No face had seen, impossible to forget ;
But only thought, as bent the page above,
How sweet, for others, it must be to love !

LXXV.

Round her was many a fearless gentleman,
Of seemly frame and soul above disguise ;
The strong lithe offshoots of some burly clan,
Hearty of voice, with genial hands and eyes :
Sooth, not unlike, in all that manhood can,
Her father, only younger and less wise,
And oh ! how much less dear ! brave, but perchance
Not heroes for a maiden's first romance.

LXXVI.

But when, that night, she, left alone with sleep,
Dimpled the pillow with her golden head,
Would stealthy dream o'er trustful slumber creep,
Now come, now gone, now clear, now vanish'd,
Of one whose words could thrill, whose voice could weep,
Whose silence more than others' language said,
Manlier than men, gentler than women are,
Bright as a sun, but quiet as a star.

LXXVII.

And gentleness-in-strength wins those that are,
Not strong, but gentle only ; and when dawn
With glittering prow burst o'er the Eastern bar,
And gossamer-veiled mead and dew-faced lawn
Seemed waves of rippling sunshine scanned afar,
The waking thoughts of Olive back were drawn
Unto sweet yesterday, with half-owned hope
To-day, afresh, to tread love's gradual slope.

LXXVIII.

But from that pleasant pathway fitful Fate,
Who bridles with delay the human heart,
Only to speed it to the goal more straight,
All the long morn, with many a spurious start,
Withheld their fretful footsteps,—trifles, prate,
Which, themselves worthless, let prized time depart.
Nor till the dark elm shadows nigh had grown
Long as their trunks, roved they once more alone.

LXXIX.

Then over silent sward, and underneath
Pendulous trees, and onwards to the sweeter,
Close-leafy bosks, whose genial branches wreath
For the heart's communings a refuge meeter,
Where even the thoughtless winds forbear to breathe,
But the fleet hours pass pitilessly fleeter ;
Or where, half-sadly warbling as it went,
Like a boy-poet's happy discontent,

LXXX.

Moss-bedded runnel anxious music made,
Eager for broader future ; and along
The freër streamlet, till the rash cascade
Bounded adown the cataract, would-be strong ;
Thence by the lake's mild margin that delayed
Its froward petulance, and by the song
Of river blithe with its enfranchisement,
Olive and Godfrid solitary went.

LXXXI.

The world was all shut out, and Eden's gate
Upon its golden hinges back was rolled.
Death, deluge, tongues' confusion, sorrow, hate,
Seemed but a tale, to please sweet sadness told ;
Such as some minstrel, welcomed by the great,
Strenuous would wring from simple harp of old,
Waking live echoes in the long-dead years,
And melting happy hearts to happier tears.

LXXXII.

Twice precious pathos ! thou that dost console
The empty cup when joy hath drunk its fill !
Thou art the beauteous autumn of the soul,
That stands betwixt us and blank winter's chill !
And if one sits upon some pensive bole,
With curtained eyes, when every wind is still,
The falling leaves in grave October's bowers
Sound just like April's gaily pattering showers.

LXXXIII.

Joy is the mistress of the vulgar breast,
Which feasts in turn with all, and venal flies
From the stripped board to banquet newly drest :
While sadness is the consort of the wise,
Who look on joy but as a passing guest,
To entertain awhile in generous guise ;
But, gone, they swift forget his alien face,
For sorrow's tender hand and nameless grace.

LXXXIV.

No such, no kindred thoughts, as yet perplexed
These two young souls, on moving to their fate.
Cheeks nearer drawn by some magnetic text,
Hand at a rural stile or churlish gate
Held out for courteous aid, but till the next
For more than courtèsy retained, and prate
Which dipped into the inner life, were all
That proved them heritors of Adam's Fall.

LXXXV.

But summer days, like happiest fairy story
That e'er of love and love's crowned longings breathed,
Sadden to close, and slowly-fading glory
Of dell, and glade, and runnel meadow-sheathed,
And breadths of bracken green round beeches hoary,
Dies, and to memory only is bequeathed ;
And tight-linked hands, at parting's leaden knell,
Relax, and wave irresolute farewell.

LXXXVI.

And by the porch impatient horses paw,
And nearer sound admonitory feet.
Spurred by the desperate hour, released from awe
By sudden sense of parting, rashly meet,
But strangers hitherto, their lips, to draw
A draught of joy so novel, so complete,
They feel that, voided of the common air,
That kiss must linger, fixed for ever there !

LXXXVII.

A moment only : but such moments are,
Beyond time's count, aye, or eternity's.
Closer the feet ; upon the door ajar
Intrusive hand. From just-discovered bliss
Themselves they wrench asunder. Faint and far
O'er gravel drive, o'er harder highway, is
Prolonged the fragile link of sounding wheel.
Then, hush. Then twilight. Then Night's silent seal.

LXXXVIII.

And swiftly borne along through winding lanes,
Belted by thickets in whose cloistered deeps
Nature's recluses sang late vesper strains,
Godfrid, like one who now half wakes half sleeps,
Dropping on dreamy consciousness the reins,
Till o'er the will an opiate slumber creeps,
His soul surrendered to that mystic bliss
Which memory keeps from a departed kiss !

LXXXIX.

Kiss, because flown for ever, ne'er forgot,
Since unfulfilled, with freshness still besprent,
Love's baptism of dew, love's tightest knot,
Of all love's rites the holiest sacrament :
A never full-ripe fruit, that cannot rot,
An unplucked flower which ne'er will shed its scent ;
Perfect imperfect, nought can mar or mend,
A fair beginning, still uncursed by end !

XC.

And when the gloaming, faded from the sky,
Left dim the outlines of each twisting lane,
He still was wandering where the sun rode high,
By glade and stream, grave wood and florid plain,
With one whose soul was stationed in her eye,
Fresh as June's grass, golden as Autumn's grain,
Whose voice was passion's undertone, whose mouth,
Sweet as warm showers blown up from the soft South.

XCI.

Nor till he marked the melancholy gleam
Of huddled homes, and with a shock of pain
Heard the Promethean monster's strident scream,
Vanished calm rapture's visionary reign.
'Then, like to one who starts from a deep dream,
And but beholds the darkness, so in vain
He strove with fancy's eye once more to see,
Lying awake with black reality.

XCII.

And as on roaring adamantine feet
Further and further ever was he whirled
From the closed gates of Eden's vanished seat,
Now 'neath dun domes in rolling vapour furled,
Now 'twixt white banks of moonlit meadowsweet,
From dreamland's heights yet lower was he hurled,
Till, hemmed in 'twixt the past and future years,
Turning, he stood, like quarry girt with spears.

XCIII.

“Two days!” he mused; “interpolated days,
Which but the more confuse life’s puzzling text,
And, save one have the courage to erase,
What went first stultifies, and what goes next
Involves in irremediable maze.
So what some moping pedant, when perplexed,
Doth with his pen’s point, shall I fear to do?
Speak but the will, and memory blots it through.

XCIV.

“Yet,—yet can will so ’gainst itself contend,
Or memory such a faithful henchman be,
That shall resolve to slay its bosom friend,
And this obey its sternest enemy?
How shall I wish the scarce-begun to end,
Or where forget how memorable she?
With what is writ, an idle war we wage:
The blot shows through upon the other page.

XCV.

“Say, is this Love? Love no such question asks.
Love never yet was yoked with sluggish doubt;
And while tame Fancy in the sunshine basks,
And purrs and blinks, wild passion roams about,
Intent upon its predatory tasks.
Who questions if love’s fire be in or out?
The moment ’tis alight, it shines so clear,
Nought then is seen but its own atmosphere!

XCVI.

“This is not love : ’tis fancy’s newest born ;
A bastard to be strangled in its crib ;
A misbegotten harbinger of scorn,
Quick from the sight for ever to be hid.
Yet,—yet how fair, under the flaky thorn
She looked ! how fresh, the vocal woods amid !
And when the nightingales sang fast and clear,
How more than fresh or fair ! How close ! How dear !

XCVII.

“Could hers be love, though mine but fancy were ?
Are not maids caught in springes manhood breaks ?
That which I doubt may be deep truth to her,
And she thirst more from draught that my thirst slakes.
Oh, I were base as any garbage cur,
If I could sleep when such a bosom wakes,
Or could I call out love’s name loud and clear,
Then let its echoes die upon her ear !

XCVIII.

“Love’s name ! Doth love thus readily reply ?
And can her heart, chaste as yon dewy moon
That lo ! once more comes sliding up the sky,
From mine have taken fire,—so soon, so soon !
From mine ! Presumptuous thought ! Why, what am I ?
An instrument unused, so out of tune,
That, did I sound it, who would care to sing
To its discordant note and slackened string ?

XCIX.

“And were I strung to concert pitch, and made
To chime in with the world’s smooth hackneyed song,
I should by sordid fingers but be played,
Swelling the scrannel music of the throng.
What avails quiet pride against parade,
What stubborn principle ’gainst lissoni wrong?
Ah! poor is poor indeed when ’tis not proud,
And lonely is twice lonely in the crowd!

C.

“Oh! I can see it all. Assume the best:
Let self-love brood upon the unhatched hope
That I could force the chamber of her breast;
’Twould swiftly swarm with foes with whom to cope,
I all unarmed, were madness manifest.
What are your means? Enough to buy a rope.
Buy it, before the world, indignant grown,
Dangles you from a gibbet of its own!

CI.

“A pretty suitor! Poor as a church-mouse,
And not so pious! For your church-mouse feeds
On crumbs and candle-droppings from God’s House;
While you,—lean you,—you sit outside the Creeds,
Too much perplexed to kneel, too proud to chouse,
A roofless thing of nakedness and needs:
Fit for a whipping-post, but scarce, God wot,
For father, husband, magistrate, what-not.

CII.

"O, dear, dear Olive ! Kind voice ! gentle eyes !
If I could topsy-turvy turn the earth,
And make its axis spin quite otherwise,
Desire should ne'er thus terminate in dearth.
But who am I, that quarrels with the skies ?
Askew from fault of temper, taint of birth,—
But no ! I know the world is base, and I
Clutch the sound faith, and in that faith must die."

CIII.

"So farewell to that dream, as sweet as e'er
Upon Hyperion or Pompilius stole,
Purer than Dian, as Egeria fair,
The nympholepsy of this prisoned soul.
I shall retain its divine image there,
And she, perhaps, faint on some secret scroll
Will write my name, to glance at times within,
And, sighing, say, ' Oh that it might have been !'

CIV.

"So, better so, that kiss should seal the past,
Than we should journey on from stage to stage
Of lengthening bliss to a bare goal at last,
And be but heart-sore for the pilgrimage !
Farewell, sweet lips ! I will not break my fast,
Nor at your fount youth's selfish thirst assuage.
Forgive—forget—that one deep breathless draught !
Thou, the pure wave ; 'twas I alone that quaffed."

CV.

“And thou mayst go upon thy maiden way,
Careless and free as never-stopping brook,
By which the drouthy hind, at close of day,
Halting, and laying on the ground his crook,
Lieth prone, and dips to drink its sparkling spray;
Whilst it, nor robbed nor soiled by what he took,
But laughs and trips along, elusive elf,
Singing its happy secret to itself.”

CVI.

Thus with a sigh, such as will ofttimes heave
Pathetic fancy in a gentle breast,
Not, not those gasps of passionate pain that leave
No room i' the heart for any wiser guest,
And hence with ear attentive to receive
The hints of reason, friend of what is best,
Spurning soft pleasure for right's harder sake,
Godfrid relinquished what he scarce could take.

CVII.

“I send,” he wrote, “the book of Tuscan lays,
You said 'twould give you pleasure to possess,
In poor return for those two happy days
I owe to your abounding graciousness;
Such as a grateful bankrupt debtor pays,
Who cannot pay, but would his debt confess.
How I enjoyed our strolls I ne'er could tell:
To such as I, they come not twice. Farewell.”

CVIII.

"I thank you," she replied, "for your kind note,
And for the Tuscan songs you send with it.
Already I know some of them by rote.
Others transcend my feeble woman's wit.
The best, I think, are those I heard you quote ;
And once or twice I wished that you could sit
Beside me as I read them, and explain
The passages that puzzle my dull brain.

CIX.

"You recognize a debt that is not due,
And readily could pay whate'er were owed.
You have a world of wealth amassed by few,
Which was on me too lavishly bestowed.
I did enjoy our strolls as much as you,
And there are other walks than those I showed,
That lovelier grow with the advancing year.
I'm sure you always will be welcome here."

CX.

He wrote again, still striving to combine
His sense of her rare winsomeness and worth
With stubborn facts that forced him to resign
His hold, and own his servitude to earth ;
Hoping that she would read between each line
He was uprooting fondness at its birth,
Only because he knew, if left to grow,
The flower would be but bane, the fruit but woe.

CXI.

But there are hearts in whom love's subtle seeds
So promptly germinate, so swiftly spread,
That ere the careless hand which dropped them heeds,
'Tis all too late to tear them from the bed.
And Olive, wandering slow 'mong woods and meads,
Haunted by one dear voice, one echoing tread,
Felt she could never the remembrance smother
Of that close kiss, excepting with another !

CXII.

He was not near to give it. In its place
Came letters, loveless, lacking warmth and life,
Which, changing vague delight to keen disgrace,
Self setting with intenser self at strife,
Deepened the sense of that too close embrace,
Such as transforms to all but wedded wife
The bosom truly maiden ; uncompleted,
Leaves a reproach behind, profoundly seated.

CXIII.

O purity of women who are pure !
To praise it is to soil it. Sudden pledge,
At moment when no surety can be sure,
Had she bestowed by treacherous parting's ledge.
Should that betrothal hasty not endure !
Would she were lying underneath the sedge
Strolled past with him, whom she, unknissed before,
Too much had given, should she give no more.

CXIV.

And stronger waxed within her trembling soul
This demon horror, till, whene'er she walked
By grassy undulation, tufted knoll,
Concealing hedgerow where the slender-stalked
Convolvulus peeped out, or past the bole
Of weathered ash where she had sate and talked
With him the afternoons away, it stepped
Close to her side, and, terrified, she wept.

CXV.

And when lone night from its dark loosened tresses
Would o'er the earth invisible spices shake,
What time its subtle sister, slumber, presses
Consenting lids, did Olive, still awake,
Bent o'er his letters, with unstable guesses
At their fixed meaning, aggravate her ache,
Then lean out at her casement, with moist eyes
Raised to the stars, unanswering in the skies.

CXVI.

But when the hush was very deep, and o'er
The drowsy world the slumberous film had floated,
The trouble in her breast would rise and pour
Out melody, low, brief, and broken-throated,
As to sick babe a nurse of simple lore,
Or to itself a mind that strayed and doted.
But the wild notes nor nurse nor mind unstrung
Was like to know ; and these the words she sung.

Will the sun never set ?

Will the twilight never fade ?

My heart is sick, my eyes are wet,

With the night and his step delayed.

Go, loitering light, from the west !

Sink, floating light, in the stream !

Fold, breeze, thy pinions, and rest !

Rest : sleep ; and dream !

The twilight lingers still.

I hate the hues on the hill ;

I hate the sundown streak !

Oh ! if I could but wreak

On crimson crag, on saffron peak,

My baffled will !

Oh ! come to me, silent as stars !

Come to me, soft as the dew !

Come as the light through my bars

When moons are new.

But come ! come ! come !

My own, my sweet, my true !

Oh ! come !

I have flung the lattice wide,

That the tendrils of the vine

May guide your arms as they climb and glide

Nearer up to mine !

Come ! come ! come !

I cannot be mute, be dumb,

For I pine, I pine, I pine !

Hush ! It is he ! I heard
A footstep in the laurelled walk !
Ah ! no ! 'Twas but a dreaming bird
Chased by a phantom hawk !

I cannot await him longer.
Love, ruffled against delay,
A moment fiercer, stronger,
Beats,—flutters,—faints away !

CXVII.

Thus like a bird that ceaseth its sad flute
Because none answereth, so on the dumb night
Died the warm strain, and Olive too was mute.
Glistened the grass like tessellated light,
The dewdrops hung upon the boughs like fruit ;
And at the window, motionless and white,
All but her golden hair, she nursed her dole,
And let the silence sink into her soul.

CXVIII.

O purity of women who are pure !
They know, and yet they know not. In their breast
A fearsome, restless secret they immure,
Which to themselves is never quite confessed,
But oft withal, as though they can endure
No longer Nature's promptings being repressed,
Escapes in floods of tears, or tell-tale praise
Of amorous song and poet's burning lays.

CXIX.

They are like children playing on the beach
Of a mysterious ocean. Fascinated
By the strange terror it inspires, let preach
As mother instinct may, their steps elated
Will trespass where the faint foam-fringes reach.
Cometh, asudden, wave precipitated
By the dread sea they toy with : how they fly,
From earnest peril, with a feeble cry !

CXX.

Olive had fled too late, and now her heart,
O'ertaken in its flight, was drenched with doubt.
O yes ! he loved her ! What ! he played a part,
When, as they watched the timid stars come out,
And the pale moon on her long journey start,
His voice had faltered ! He but meant to flout
Weak love's confiding promptness, when he pressed
His lips to hers, her breast unto his breast !

CXXI.

Yet, if he did not love her ! Did love weigh
Impulse and prudence in a dangling scale ?
Did love, o'erawed by numbers, shirk the fray,
Or, when winds blew untoward, furl its sail ?
Was love a sage ? What did those letters say ?
They breathed no strain of hope, no note of wail,
But in each pondered line there spake alone
Will's stately voice and wisdom's sovran tone.

CXXII.

Some six weeks later, Godfrid, who in vain
Had striven to lay the ghosts of that dead time
Whose pleasure now had curdled into pain,
And whose reviewed delights seemed almost crime,
Striving to think that she would still retain,
For all their blight, the freshness of her prime,
Dogged by lame doubt, by self-reproach distressed,
Received a note by Olive's pen addressed.

CXXIII.

He tore it open with a trembling hand,
And with a greedy eye its contents read,
Written, it seemed, in haste, and quickly scanned.
"I write to tell you my last news, instead
Of leaving it to gossip's busy band.
I am engaged, and shortly shall be wed.
Congratulate me, won't you? All here send
Their best regards. I fear that I must end."

CXXIV.

Brightened his visage, quickly as the sun
When passeth from its disc a shapeless cloud,
And his whole port expanded, like to one
Who 'neath a heavy pack hath long been bowed,
But, now he doffs it since his trudge is done,
Stretches his limbs and gasps his thanks aloud.
Fear, like strayed bird, an unintended guest,
Fled through the opened windows of his breast.

CXXV.

For Olive rose before him, only fair,
Happy, and now not beauteous more than blithe,
A harvest of perfections, ripe as rare,
Low leaning towards love's kindly curving scythe.
The pangs of starved desire, of parched despair,
Which they who yearn unyearned-for vainly writhe
Hourly beneath, no longer found a place
In the bright record of her youth and grace.

CXXVI.

But, as misgivings vanished, which erewhile
Had with her image blent a nameless dread,
Once more the sense of her responsive smile,
Her listening gaze, her raised or downcast head,
Her soft replies, her questions without guile,
All, all, she looked, or did, or thought, or said,
Pierced his heart's crust, like February flowers,
Checked by March frosts, re-cheered by April's showers.

CXXVII.

And as once more his faithful memory gazed
Upon the unblurred vision of delight,
Remorse of late had almost half erased,
The sharp thought smote him, in his own despite,
How vain a ghost self-flattering fear had raised,
How brief, how trivial, love's imagined might,
And how, while housed he lonely self-reproof,
Joy had built nest and twittered 'neath her roof.

CXXVIII.

But these base nether tempters, which still haunt
With subterranean voice the brightest minds
In their dark issues, honour bade avaunt,
With exorcising power that always binds.
Self-love, the sycophant with ready taunt,
Gross self-indulgence that besots and blinds,
And lank regret still mumbling its dry bone,
Skulked to their dens, as honour took its throne.

CXXIX.

Grateful serenity his soul subdued,
And with a heart from dallying fancies clear,
He blessed kind Fate for that fair interlude,
Whose smiles and kiss thus closed without a tear.
Nowise he wished its luscious hours renewed,
But only felt how, many a coming year,
He might remember with a guiltless breast
The radiant being he had once caressed.

CXXX.

And sure 'tis something, when the days grow dark,
Since Love's brief torch hath to the socket burned,
To know there was a voice which once did hark
Your soul's weak wail, nor its poor essays spurned ;
That, come what may of coldness or of cark,
Of sheer oblivion, fondness unreturned,
One enrapt seraph, mute now 'neath the sod,
Deemed this cramped earth a Heaven, and you its God !

CXXXI.

“Deign to accept,” he wrote, “if from afar,
My fondest wishes for your future life.
May you be happy, as you gentle are,
And what you were as daughter, be as wife !
I pray in Heaven there move some vigilant star,
To ward from off you sorrow, loss, or strife,
And circle round you smoothly to the end.
Farewell ! with homage from your grateful friend.”

CXXXII.

O thou eternal secret, woman's heart !
Now, as when Eve was fooled, profoundly hid.
Man into life hath forced dead tongues to start,
Wrested dumb truths from stony pyramid,
Spanned the high hills, made of blank seas a chart,
And through the stars triumphant pathway thrid ;
But woman's heart, the riddle still unread,
Confounds the living, and confutes the dead.

CXXXIII.

In that sad season of the bygone year,
When woolly mists the chillier landscape wrap,
And beggared Autumn, with a silent tear,
Empties her gold leaves into Winter's lap,
Another guest, lord 'mong those hills severe
Whose harvest is the heather, and where flap
Crag-cradled kittiwakes o'er splintered foam,
Had crossed the porch of Olive's gentler home.

CXXXIV.

Him had her sire through prickly stubble led,
Marked for him coign of vantage on the track
Where towered the slow-flushed pheasant overhead,
And ta'en him, eager, where the twinkling pack,
Mute as though muzzled, work the gorse bed,
Till gleeful throat to gleeful throat peals back,
Then sweep o'er rolling down and dipping vale,
Straight as trim barks that head a following gale.

CXXXV.

Men praised his steady nerve, true hand, quick eye,
Tall granite frame, clean limbs, and mien robust ;
Yet, softer critics, though they scarce knew why,
With colder voice his vaunted parts discussed.
“No, not the man to wake a woman's sigh :
Goodly, no doubt, brave, generous, helpful, just ;
But lacking in the mien, the tones, that draw
The charmed heart onwards by some subtle law.”

CXXXVI.

But every lip averred that Olive's grace
Bounded the horizon of Sir Gilbert's eye,
That, noon and eve, her side seemed still his place,
And he was vacant when she was not nigh.
Yet could they read no tremor in her face,
No flush of pride, no cautious dread descry,
No sudden glow of fondness chilled by fear,
To show she knew that Love was walking near.

CXXXVII.

But she had scarce been woman had her heart
Not guessed the secret others quick surmised,
Though without spoken word did he depart,
Save unto Olive's mother ; who, apprized
Thus of his suit, with true maternal art
Heard his confession kindly, but advised
On time, rich sleeping partner, to depend
To bring his venture to a gainful end.

CXXXVIII.

She was not busy, like her active spouse,
With poachers, swedes, fat stock, or quarter-session,
And so while Olive under leafy boughs
With Godfrid roved, had felt the vague impression
That sympathy, which needs no uttered vows,
And love, more deep since lacking love's confession,
Were budding fast. So she, when Godfrid went,
Though "come again" was said, felt more content.

CXXXIX.

But when, though now no more athwart the lawn
His shadow travelled, Olive's shadow still,
And slower than its wont, was ever drawn
Along the grass where they had drunk their fill
Of unshared converse, and nor eve, nor dawn,
Nor even sunny noon which cleared the hill
Of fleeciast clouds, the settled sadness drave
From off her brow, the mother's grew as grave.

CXL.

She blamed herself. They had been left alone,
Too much, too long! Yet the whole time was brief.
Ah! but a woman's wisdom should have known
How quickly fancy cometh into leaf,
And love more swift than fabled gourd is grown.
But surely love was not yet grafted with grief,
Nor was 't too late to hope the one's sweet root
Would never bear the other's bitter fruit?

CXLI.

Closely she watched, and waited for a week.
Then fainting hope succumbed to succoured fears;
For Olive's brow still brooded, and her cheek
Betrayed the passage of clandestine tears.
'Twas all too plain. So she made haste to seek
Her husband's aid, and pour into his ears
What doubtless had escaped his eyes, since men
Lack, self-absorbed, the woman's outward ken.

CXLII.

He listened with the air of one who wakes
In a strange room, and wonders where he lies,
And thinks 't must be the old one, till the flakes
Of slumber slowly melting from his eyes,
His memory, aroused, fresh survey takes,
And then he marvels at his own surprise.
He saw the truth more plainly now, the more
Illusion had befooled his gaze before.

CXLIII.

He ne'er had thought of Olive, save as sent
To be the uncaged songster of his home,
Nor dreamed that hers, like other wings, were meant,
When fledged by love, in wider fields to roam.
Now, now he saw she could no more be pent,
But like the dove which o'er subsiding foam
Flew out to ne'er return, that she would fly
From his brief shelter to a broader sky.

CXLIV.

All that was left him was to speed her flight
With willing prayers, and nurse a pious trust
Her fair feet would in happy groves alight.
Shut in by close dark bars, she would but thrust
Her chafed neck out towards worlds, imagined bright.
So 'twas at length resolved that Olive must
Sir Gilbert marry, ere the yet young year
Lay stiff and cold upon its snow-white bier.

CXLV.

At first she started at his name, as starts
A grazing colt when cunning bait is brought,
And broke away. But when with coaxing arts
They followed slowly still, and still besought,
She, like the colt, when its wise dread departs,
Came to their beck and nibbled, and was caught.
Then, still like it, which yields when o'er its head
The halter slips, she let herself be led.

CXLVI.

So seemed it unto them at least, whose past
Had only skimmed the inland lakes of life,
Whose sails had still swung lightly round the mast,
Nor e'er been swelled and strained by winds of strife.
They little guessed what made her yield at last,
Or, when she promised to be Gilbert's wife,
She would have wed the wintry wind, or laid
Her limbs on couch smoothed by the sexton's spade.

CXLVII.

He was a man of not uncommon worth
In this determined isle whose tongue we speak,
The only one he had been taught from birth,
Except a little Latin and less Greek.
England he deemed the navel of the earth,
And night and morning blessed the silver streak,
Holding the faith, there lived beyond its waves
But papists, revolutionists, and slaves.

CXLVIII.

He knew the trick of every bird that flies,
Of every fish that swims, and could have told
When those would lie quite close, when these would rise,
How to entice the shy, outtire the bold.
He laughed to scorn the boast of sunny skies,
Of marble cities, orchards hung with gold,
Vowing one day's rough tramp through gloomy heather
Worth a whole year of stagnant Southern weather.

CXLIX.

For him the poets, priests, lawgivers, sages,
Of ever youthful Eld had lived in vain.
He reaped no rapture from its ripened pages,
He gleaned no wisdom from its ruined fane.
Was he the child of all the kingly ages,
'Twas but to prove how profitless their reign.
The sighs of genius, and the hymns of glory,
Were but to him an empty-sounding story.

CL.

He felt no tremor when the evening star
In the moist west the vanished sun succeeds,
And in the heart the sense of things afar
Grows a religion deeper than all creeds.
How, in such moments, flesh and spirit jar,
And deepest joy still deeper anguish breeds,
He never owned, nor yearned for that vague goal
Towards which some god still goads the panting soul.

CLI.

The contemplation, and the pangs profound,
That fain would sound unfathomable seas
Of light, and colour, darkness, silence, sound,
Life's straining aches,—he nothing recked of these.
Brute-like, he walked with eyes upon the ground ;
He heard no promise in Spring's dimpling breeze,
No buried hopes in Autumn's curdling dirge,
Nor shared the secrets of the wailful surge.

CLII.

Yet scorn him not, O ye whose finer strings
Move to the murmur of the faintest wind ;
For oftentimes the soul in hidden springs
And subterranean currents dwells confined.
And haply should the loss of cherished things
Force for it sudden passage to the mind,
Its pent-up waters will outflow and borrow
A tardy channel through the clefts of sorrow.

CLIII.

And even now he vaunted all that lends
An outward glamour to domestic state,
Birth, lands, position, multitude of friends
Among the splendid, privileged, and great.
And if these gifts should hardly make amends
For gaps confessed, add a most noble gait
And blameless life, he was, 't must be allowed,
A man of whom might any girl be proud.

CLIV.

And Olive was not slow to note and feel
His dumb deserts and modesty sincere ;
And if at times another voice would steal
Betwixt him and her only half-lent ear,
As on an adder straight one plants one's heel,
She trod its whispers down with foot of fear
Which breeds a cruel courage, even to dare
Trample the hapless thing it fain would spare.

CLV.

At times her voice would falter, and her eye
Fill with the moisture of a causeless tear,
Or her frame tremble, as 'neath sunniest sky
Creeps a strange shiver over windless mere.
And ever and anon with sudden sigh
Checked she quick mirth, as flying cavalier
Reins in his steed an instant, and looks back,
And listens, is one following on his track.

CLVI.

Nor did these tokens of distress escape
Sir Gilbert's gaze ; who deemed, withal, that she Felt but as one who round a doubtful cape
Sails from loved shore into an unknown sea.
And like a fruit, which swells to perfect shape
Upon its native wall and parent tree,
But ripens best indoors, he hoped that so
Beneath his roof her bliss would mellow grow.

CLVII.

So passed the weeks ; summer no longer reigned,
And nearer moved the looked-for marriage morn ;
Autumn came slowly through the yellow-grained,
Lithe-swaying slopes, and took away the corn.
The harvest moon unto a sickle waned,
Hung o'er the golden harvest it had shorn,
High up in heaven, still brightly curved but idle.
The next would shine at full on Olive's bridal.

CLVIII.

Musing on no such theme, but from the seat
Of hospitable laird in shaggy Perth
But just returned, to where deserted street,
Famed haunts of Splendour tenantless, and dearth
Of all that fills the void for urban feet,
Made London seem the loneliest place on earth,
Resolved at once to quit it for another,
Godfrid encountered Olive and her mother.

CLIX.

The shop whence they that moment had emerged,
Plainly bespoke their errand up to Town.
The colour to the maiden's temples surged ;
To Godfrid's rose—but quick repressed,—a frown.
The kindly parent farewell visit urged.
“It was no distance. Would he not run down ?
”Twould quiet be, but quieter anon ;
For, three weeks more, and Olive would be gone.”

CLX.

A heartier invitation ne'er was given.
Old fears were laid. Had Olive once to fight
Against her heart, she not in vain had striven,
And had not Godfrid long been lost to sight ?
He, by he knew not what emotion driven,
But grown incautious in his own despite,
Gave to the honest pressure swift consent :
Yes, he would go ; on Friday. And he went.

CLXI.

The evening mists were settling as he drew
Nigh to the porch whence, four short months ago,
He from quick-tasted bliss as quickly flew,—
Now without throb of joy or dream of woe.
Why he had come at all he scarcely knew,
Save that he lacked the courage to say No,
And feared to play a half ungracious part,
Seeming distrustful still of Olive's heart.

CLXII.

The kindest welcome waited him. Withal,
Dinner was longsome, conversation flagged ;
Until, while Olive scarcely talked at all,
Her parents and their guest grew likewise gagged.
The dear old airs and ballads seemed to pall,
And time, slow ministrant on dulness, lagged.
So that they all, though each one did protest
" 'Tis early yet," went willingly to rest.

CLXIII.

In the slant sunlight of the young October,
Dew-dashed lay meadow, upland, wood, and pool ;
Mid-time delicious, when all hues are sober,
All sounds an undertone, all airs are cool :
When Nature seems awhile to pause and probe her,
Asking her heart if her eventful rule
Hath blest the earth she loveth, and to brace her
Against the wintry darksome days that face her.

CLXIV.

Then, side by side, and unaccompanied,
But now for all their nearness more divided
Than if between them swayed an ocean's tide,
Forth through the wonted ways they slowly glided.
It seemed as if the Summer's life had died
In their hearts too, where once it had resided,
And Autumn had infused her solemn mood
In them, as in the sky, the mere, the wood.

CLXV.

And as nor pipe of birds, nor foliage fluttering,
On the air's quiet pensiveness intruded,
But only ever and anon the muttering
Of loosened leaf from branches scarce denuded,
So from their lips, once so profuse in uttering
All love-swayed sounds, at intervals exuded
Unwilling word,—a syllable,—a sigh,—
Stirred by no inspiration, dropped to die.

CLXVI.

At length they halted where a lake, hemmed in
By wheeling bank, its liberty asserted,
Rushed for a gorge beyond with forceful din,
O'er boulder leaped, through moss-lipped crevice spirted,
Scattering its strength, but resolute to win.
Here Olive sate, with countenance averted,
Gazing adown the falls, while he surveyed
The springing cataract, the crouching maid.

CLXVII.

Their silence now seemed natural. The lake
Was silent too, but from its bosom sent,
Not less for their than for its own sad sake,
This infant stream, whose vagrant babblement
Made speech for all ; as in oppressive ache
Of those who, suffering, still would hush lament,
A child's gay talk, irrelevant and quaint,
Acquits the air of silence and restraint.

CLXVIII.

Her head was turned away ; her further cheek
Rested upon her hand ; he could but see
The nearer tresses, rippling, soft, and sleek,
The outlines of her form's mild majesty,
Shoulders whose curve a Phidias well might seek
To leave in marble, had we such as he ;
And just one small unconscious foot to hint
Of symmetry without excess or stint.

CLXIX.

He scarce had time to knit his will and brace
His heart against the rush of tender feeling,
With which the sight of loveliness and grace,
In youth electric, sets the pulses reeling,
Before she turned, but quick again her face
Averted,—all too late ! For he saw stealing
Down it those tears which silently betray
• More than all tongues can speak, all words can say.

CLXX.

Omnipotence of tears in woman's eyes !
She threatens, and we flout the weak pretender :
Cold, and we beat her at her own disguise ;
She trusts to scorn, with keener scorn we rend her.
She smiles on others, we disport a prize.
She still shall win. She weeps, and we surrender.
Artist ! amend thy craft. With shields nor spears
Mould me thy Venus Victrix, but—in tears !

CLXXI.

And Godfrid, who but now 'gainst sweet delight
Had fought and won, succumbing to distress,
To Olive's side straight hastened at the sight,
And tried each tender tone, each near caress.
He called her by her name as brothers might,
Stroked her soft hand, smoothed every truant tress,
And when the tear-shower gathered unto storm,
Curved his strong arm around her fragile form.

CLXXII.

She leaned away, she hung athwart the ledge
Of the young torrent, and with quivering lips,
“Don't,” she cried, “don't ! My pledge ! my sacred pledge !”
But he, like one whose foothold slowly slips,
Once it hath passed the precipice's edge,
And with each struggle only deeper dips,
Felt all his purpose leaving him, and held
Her form more close the more her words repelled.

CLXXIII.

From pity unto tenderness how swift
The treach'rous advance when beauty leads !
And what divine philosophy shall sift
Comfort from love, when anguished woman pleads ?
So, while condolence plied each honest shift
To stanch her tears, the fondness contact breeds
In youth's warm veins so waxed, that her distress
Soon seemed to need a yet more close caress.

CLXXIV.

And lips that once have met in days gone by,
Meet easily again in days that are ;
And kisses seem best answer to a sigh,
When silence were too cold and words would jar.
How, too, might she compassion's touch deny,
Now he was near who had so long been far,
Or more than feebly, fruitlessly withstand
Kindness which conquers quicker than command ?

CLXXV.

And though the lips, though now no more forbidden,
At length from cheating sympathy desisted,
One hand, which hinted half the yearning hidden,
With daintier palm was feverishly twisted,
While one, at first withstood, at last unhidden,
Strayed o'er her cheek, and the warm curls that kissed it ;
And thus, to love love's guile no more abhorrent,
Silent they sate, and watched the tumbling torrent.

CLXXVI.

And when the spell of silence was uncharmed,
"Let us go home," she said ; "'tis better so."
But they who fight with love are soon disarmed,
And bare their breast in striking the first blow.
So, lulled by that same lure which late alarmed,
Over the stepping-stones, for weal or woe,
Hand-linked they went, their eyes upon the ground,
And finding even in silence too much sound.

CLXXVII.

There was an arbour woven all of leaves,
Woodbine, and briony, and clambering hop,
Wild clematis its roof, wild brier its eaves,
And living trunks of fluted elms its prop.
Its floor was such as dexterous autumn weaves
Of last year's moss and this year's faded crop
Of white wood-sorrel, and coy flowers that grow
In nooks where sun scarce comes and winds ne'er blow.

CLXXVIII.

And some one of its branches had contrived,
In its most deep recess, a rustic bench,
Whence you could watch the lake's life, snugly hived :
How flashed a trout, how plopped a greedy tench,
Now skimmed a waterfowl, now dab-chick dived,
Where came the kine their lazy thirst to quench,
Or swans, their lithe necks curled 'mong down away,
Like floating islands on the water lay.

CLXXIX.

And save the lake, its people, and the woods
That girt it round, there nothing was in sight :
Fair face of changeless water, tacking broods
'Mong tall reeds motionless ;—such spot as might
Selected be by sandalled sisterhoods,
Who from the world have ta'en a timid flight,
Craving to find from lustful fumes release,
And in chaste Nature's lap a pious peace.

CLXXX.

And, trailing slow, still hand in hand, beside
The rushy brink, at length their footsteps came
Upon the arbour ; which when Godfrid spied,
Halting and bending forward his tall frame,
To peer within, "What a sweet nook !" he cried.
"Who trained these branches was not much to blame.
Shall we not use their shade, and see, unseen,
The yellowing Autumn trench on Summer's green?"

CLXXXI.

Nothing there was he now could ask but she
Had yielded speechless and enslaved assent ;
So like to one who hears a sure decree,
Under the hospitable boughs she went,
Where, hands still joined and laid upon his knee,
They sate down in the leafy tenement,
Sighing to think, beyond this cloistered mere,
Lay a broad world of noise, and hate, and fear.

CLXXXII.

Nor when around her gently-curving frame,
Their palms disjoined, a gentle arm was curved,
More than soft-footed fawn that hath grown tame
Starts at a human voice, shrank she or swerved.
But when her face burst sudden all aflame,
His shoulder for a screening pillow served,
Whereon she leaned her sorrow-drooping head,
Passive as though it were her bier or bed :

CLXXXIII.

And there remained. No word, no look, no sigh,
Her stillness stirred. She felt the hour bestowed
Bliss she were well content to take and die,
Would they but off her lift life's weary load.
She did not wish, she did not think, to lie
Nearer than this, but felt that pity owed
At least one brief indulgence unto woe,
Ere dear to-day changed to dead long-ago.

CLXXXIV.

O purity of women who are pure !
Could men but fathom it ! Longwhile she leaned,
Quiet as sleeping babe and as secure,
Upon the rugged pillow, where she gleaned
Glimpses of things unseen, but not less sure :
Till, feeling that she had too long been weaned
From founts which fed her fondness, she upraised
Her face, and full into his features gazed.

CLXXXV.

But when she saw, responsive to the look,
A sultry glow slow gathering in his eyes,
Presaging passion's flash, she could not brook
The thought that she should make less good and wise
Her new, her only idol, so betook
Her head again to its late paradise,
And said, with plaintive voice and still-born smile,
"Talk to me, Godfrid ! talk, a little while."

CLXXXVI.

"Talk of what, Olive ? Of sweet days gone by,
Or bitter, girded will is bound to face ?"
"No, of yourself," she said, "the theme that I
Could muse as time still ran his endless race.
Love, though an egotist, can deify
A vulgar fault, and drape the gross with grace.
You are myself, and I would hear of you :—
What you have done, and what you hope to do."

CLXXXVII.

"To do !" he cried. "Ah ! there you press the sore
Which will nor close nor heal, but ever since
Candour's bright weapon gashed me to the core,
Aches heavily, and, handled, makes me wince.
For there are wounds which, though you stanch the gore,
And their frayed clotted edges cleanse and rinse,
Remain wounds still, and are, when time hath done
All time can do, chief conscious part of one."

CLXXXVIII.

“To do ! A question I this long while ask ;
Though there be answers pressing all around.
Why not in social sunshine trip and bask,
Taking the world as at one’s birth ’twas found ?
Dolt ! to be craving for stale spur and casque !
Rattle wealth’s armour ; ’t has a richer sound
Than the crude chink of steel that dints and hurts.
When gold strikes home, it is not blood that spirts.

CLXXXIX.

“Blood ! watery word,—when the red currents got
From pure sanguineous source have serous grown,
A sluggard, pale, coagulated clot,
Marred by some thin suffusion of our own.
Doth the sire sober save the son, a sot ?
Must sovran virtue needs hand down its throne ?
A gentleman ! No ! Gentlemen should rule,
Not play the dandy, sycophant, or tool !

CXC.

“Command you crave ? Then bustle and grow rich :
You shall be gentleman, and ruler too.
Your name’s in holes ? Put in a golden stitch,
And none will care to know the old from new.
Nay, dainty Olive ! better hedge and ditch,
Swill oaten porridge, drink some homely brew,
And thank God for one’s simpleness, than be
A ruler-gentleman of such degree !

CXCI.

“Proud. Who is proud? It once was not deemed pride
To enthrone honour as mailed conscience’ king,
And at its heels a loyal vassal ride,
Careless if it should rank or ruin bring.
Now, push,—worm,—or cajole yourself inside
The sweating miners of the moneyed ring,
And shine a Prince, yourself, when,—quickly done!—
You have washed the dirt from off the gold you won.

CXCII.

“Oh, I doff patience when I think that such,
Corrupting those who still on honour doat,
If senilely, spread wide greed’s itching clutch.
Why, I would rather be a captured stoat,
In my own ermine to a pheasant-hutch
Nailed by vindictive varlet through the throat,
Than buy rank second-hand, or pawn, for gold,
Honour which, unredeemed, is straightway sold.

CXCIII.

“What have I done? What do I hope to do?
Just to sit patient, Olive, in the shade,
Till the old creeds re-form, or gospel new
Their thinned disintegrated ranks invade.
What! hug the hideously false for true,
Because what, since deemed vital truth, was made
Our bosom’s idol, in our arms lies dead!
Better be Rachel, and not comforted.

CXCIV.

“Dead, aye, stone-dead, though simulating life
In reflex action, lingering minds mistake.
But because now no more the dual strife,
Fought on this earth, holds a safe Heaven for stake,
Shall our sole weapons be the glutton’s knife,
The banker’s shovel, and the croupier’s rake?
Because in doubt if soul the flesh survive,
Shall flesh be lord while soul is still alive?”

CXC.V.

“Look round ! ’Tis lord, ’tis king, sole suzerain,
Bedizened fetish of the carnal crowd;
The oracle of joy, the god of gain,
Hope of the humble, comfort of the proud.
‘Give us,’ they cry, ‘fat peace, with piled-up wain,
Cover our daughters with a golden cloud,
Unto our sons dispense pomp, pleasure, ease !’—
—Better a couch under the forest trees !

CXC.VI.

“Pardon me, gentle Olive, if I grow
A something more than egotist, and be
Rude in my speech and angry in my woe ;
But, rough or smooth, this is the truth in me.
You set scorn’s waves arolling, and they flow
Beyond my power to stem them, to the sea
Of deep disdainful silence, which awaits
In its calm breast our frothy wraths and hates.”

CXC VII.

Whereat in silent scorn of spoken scorn,
He remained mute. But Olive, not more stirred
By her own voice than field of yellowing corn
When through its stalks the west wind's sough is heard,
Said solemnly : " But, Godfrid, you were born
For more than lamentation. Why not gird
Some armour on, and in some fight engage,
Spur Honour to the front, and head the Age ? "

CXC VIII.

She could not scan his face from where she lay,
Or she had seen that cold incredulous smile,
Which women hate, first o'er his features play,
Then settle into tenderness, the while
He smoothed a tress which somewhat seemed to stray,
And said, " Fair helpmate 'gainst the low and vile,
Oh ! born to shine the Queen of gallant tilt,
Had I a sword, you—you,—should bless the hilt !

CXC IX.

" But sword is none. They who would serve their age
Must yield such service as their age requires.
Is't not the Knight must lead, and not the page ?
And can the liege lord follow his esquires ?
Show me some noble service to engage
An honest servitor ;—my pride desires
No loftier lot. Serve ? Yes. But whom ? But what ?
Not trimmer, epicure, nor plutocrat.

CC.

“These the decrepit time’s terrestrial three.
Then why not raise the standard of the morn,
And a more justified Archangel be?
Alas! the dead days bear a day not born,
Which in their still womb struggles painfully,
As we stand blank, in interval forlorn,
All widowed of the Past, and not yet led
By crying cradle from the dumb deathbed.

CCI.

“Too soon, too soon! We should not raise revolt
Until the new be ripe to oust the old;
For while the crude matures, the wise make halt.
The few are tottering on their thrones of gold:
But shall we prompt the multitude to vault
Into their seats, and ignorantly bold,
With novel sceptre conjuring, play the king?—
Wait: Winter comes ’twixt Autumn and the Spring.

CCII.

“And I must wait, and mayhap wait in vain,
Till death the janitor shall give release.
For life may prove to me, poor feeble swain,
As sometimes to the strong, a bootless lease.
Meanwhile I will not hire my soul for gain,
Nor strut the scarlet popinjay of peace;
Cozen chawbacons, coax the civic crowd,
Proud to the humble, humble to the proud.

CCIII.

“So that, sweet Olive,—very, very sweet!—
I am but part of Nature’s lavish waste;
A seed not born to germinate, a teat
Barren of joy, a fruit for none to taste:
A rash beginning, ending incomplete,
Good for no purpose, safe to be displaced
When the ground’s wanted;—doomed, at best, to be
But an impossible possibility.”

CCIV.

“Oh! in my brain if glowed the poet’s fire,
I then might try to rouse the sluggish time
By clanging all the octaves of the lyre.
Alas! for me such strains are too sublime,
Who pipe but lowly. I can but aspire
To bear in august Action’s heat and grime
A private’s part. O that the hour would come!
Meanwhile my arm must rust, my voice keep dumb.”

CCV.

He ceased. And then no sound was there to break
The Autumn’s shining haze, which seemed to rest
Low on the woods, the woods upon the lake,
The lake, asleep, on brooding Nature’s breast.
There was no wind nor wandering breath to shake
Even the long lithe water-reed’s ripe crest:
The swans’ white prows, glassed in the unstirred stream,
Kept turning on themselves in downy dream.

CCVI.

But in the deepest hour of Nature's peace,
When all her moods their wonted strifes suspend,
The human heart's disquiet will not cease,
Nor with her temporary respite blend.
And, still though Olive lay, he felt increase
Her gentle heavings to rough sobs that rend
But, alas ! shatter not the sturdy frame,
Which cages grief till grief at last grows tame.

CCVII.

But soon like wavelets on a keel-cleaved mere,
Motionless else, woe's ripples died away ;
And from her lips came comfort, calm and clear
Even as the lake which hushed before them lay.
For she descried a future, vineyards near,
That should redeem the desert of to-day :
A Promised Land, which, from its summit high,
Her love could show, not reach,—since it must die.

CCVIII.

And then she pointed to a great Beyond,
Which he might conquer with a freër stride,
Because not fettered by too close a bond,
With her dwarfed nature ; withal, fortified
By knowing she would keep an outlook fond
Still on his steps, whatever might betide,
Even when some one worthier should have gained
The heart she feared she only had profaned.

CCIX.

A melancholy wonder filled his face.
His eyes were turned from her, and wandered out,
Not in the quest of Nature's varied grace,
Such as sometimes the spirit seeks without,
When vexed within, but blankly upon space,
As in a vision tranced and devout.
At length in words significant and slow,
"Let us go home," he said. "'Tis better so."

CCX.

So home their way they wended by the lake
Cradled 'mong hushing woods, and past the fall
Whose swift untutored music shall forsake
Never their ears till death hath silenced all.
For time which heals, still leaves a cold numb ache,
Whose shootings ever and anon recall
The original sharp wound, and wring from pain
Fresh tribute to old joy's abandoned fane.

CCXI.

Long lay the shadows on the sleepy lawn
Afront the Hall, as from the covert ways
Issuing, their feet magnetically drawn
Sought the soft sward where they in summer days,
When their untroubled intercourse had dawn,
Exchanged inaugural looks of love and praise.
Now, all was ended. Praise and love were said ;
And cut off in his prime, young hope lay dead.

CCXII.

No more, as in that sweetly doubtful time,
Did they in converse' courteous strife engage,
No longer now the shadows of the lime
Fling fuller meaning on the poet's page,
No longer now authoritative rhyme
Their tread responsive hurry or assuage.
They trailed their footsteps o'er the grass-plot green,
Vagrant, with many a fitful pause between.

CCXIII.

And neither led ; but, desultory, one,
And now the other, paused, or turned, or strayed :
But whoso of the twain might seek or shun
This track or that, or halt asudden made,
The other, straight, like shadow i' the sun
Obeying substance, hastened or delayed ;
And which the substance, which the shadow, none
Could have divined, so much they seemed like one.

CCXIV.

There was a marble basin, mid-sward placed,
Where falling fountain-sprays subduedly tinkled,
And, as these kept afalling, still retraced
The broken fragile rain-dome which they sprinkled.
Here, on its brim they sate, their loiterings paced,
Watching the water by the drops scarce wrinkled,
And seeing in its calm but hazy deep
Each other's face, as one sees face in sleep.

CCXV.

Once when he turned to hide recurring frown,
And dipped his hand into the imprisoned wave,
Hers plunged and seized on it as though 'twould drown,
Low-moaning in the tone of them that rave,
“ Oh ! if we could but drag each other down ! ”
But he, with soothing voice and aspect grave,
Said “ Upwards, you mean, Olive ! as, so far,
You have drawn me;—no siren, but a star ! ”

CCXVI.

The muffled mists came trailing up the leas,
Hemmed in the landscape, front, and flank, and rear.
Huddled the leaves more closely, and the trees
Drew in their shadows stealthily, for fear.
Then, as the horizon faded by degrees,
More plainly plashed the fountain on their ear ;
And in their hearts they louder seemed to hark
The drip of doom, more all around grew dark.

CCXVII.

But overhead a single star outstole,
And drew their gaze up from earth's weighted loam :
Outrider of the night, the first, the sole
Illumined lamp in Heaven's slow-deepening dome.
Both saw ; and both, though silent, in their soul
Deemed in such star that love might find a home,
If thither 't could be borne, leaving no trace
Athwart the far, forbidding interspace.

CCXVIII.

Then visored night with starry skirmishers
Scoured all the sky, sparing no trace of day;
And came the hour when, howsoe'er demurs
The wakeful spirit, owns the flesh its clay,
And sleep coils up life's long and writhing cares.
But all in vain did Olive kneel and pray,
In vain with eyelids falsely closed and dried
Coax coy suspicious slumber to her side.

CCXIX.

Dew-dashed again and silent, in the morn,
Lay the apparent woodlands; but not more
Silent and dew-dashed than the gaze forlorn
Of her who in her inmost being bore
A woe that humbled pride, that outbraved scorn.
The morning mounted, and the moments wore;
Moments no grief can hurry or delay,
Save when we scare them with our call to stay.

CCXX.

The tokens of departure met her eyes
And ears bewildered, and upon her rushed
As with the shock of uninformed surprise.
Her consciousness had been too wildly flushed
For her the sober truth to recognize
That he was really going; that lives crushed
Are nought to Fate, whose car indifferent drives
Betwixt exulting or o'er mangled lives.

CCXXI.

She recognized it now ; and strove to eke
The scant time out with a prolonged farewell.
O paradox of language, when we speak,
Wishing the thing we know impossible,
In one poor broken word that bubbleth weak
Up through the anguished bosom's drowning swell !
Farewell! Farewell! The Blest might wish the same
To the lone Cursed in Everlasting flame!

CCXXII.

Farewell! Farewell! She drew him to a nook,
Still bright with lingering flowers her winning ways
Had coaxed from summer when it went, and took
From out her breast something that caught the rays
Of broken sunlight, and with voice that shook,
Said: "Take and wear it in the after days!"
"Take it?" he answered. "Yes,—as I would take
A shell,—a kingdom,—for your gentle sake."

CCXXIII.

Then to the porch returning, where awaited
Motionless equipage and frothing bay,
Wonted adieux he made with voice that mated
Ill with the looks which always will betray.
Harshly the wheels upon the gravel grated,
Drew back a moment, and then dashed away,
Under the branches, through the further gate,—
She gazing after, trothed and desolate.

CCXXIV.

"I send," wrote Godfrid, "but a worthless song,
Yet one whose notes my feelings so express,
I nurse the hope it may, devoid of wrong
To any other, speak your own no less.
If so, we might perhaps be made more strong,
Nor quite so lonely in our loneliness,
If, keeping lines in which our thoughts are blended,
You sent a transcript with your name appended."

CCXXV.

Awhile seemed utter silence sole retort.
But just as tardy prudence 'gan to turn
And gibe temerity, came message short.
"They kept your letter from me. How I burn
(I have been angry : Heaven forgive me for 't !)
With shame to tell you what I only learn
This very eve. Well, I have had my way,
And send the verses, copied." These were they.

Accept it, Olive? Surely, yes ;
This ring of emeralds, diamonds too :
As I would take,—no need to press,—
A leaf, a crown from you !
No rudest art, no brightest ore,
Could make its value less or more.

Gone is my strength. 'Twere useless quite
To tell you that it is not hard

To have one's paradise in sight,
Withal, to be debarred.
And yet the generous glimpse you gave
Was more than once I dared to crave.

Hard ! very hard, sweet ! but ordained.
We know 'tis God's own world, at worst.
And we have only partly drained,
And so still partly thirst ;
While others parched remain, or seize
Fiercely the cup and drain the lees.

So let us strive to deem it well,
However now we stand aghast.
Earth, Heaven, not being parallel,
Perforce must meet at last.
And in that disembodied clime
A clasp more close may not be crime.

You loved me too well to deny :
I loved you far too well to ask.
Only a kiss, a gaze, a sigh,
A tear,—and then a mask.
We spared the fruit of Good-and-Ill ;
We dwell within our Eden still.

O sunshine in profoundest gloom,
To know that on the earth there dwells,
Somewhere, unseen, one woman whom
No noblest thought excels ;

And that by valour to resign,
I make her more than ever mine.

Too late, too late, I learn how sweet
'Twould be to reach a noble aim,
And then fling fondly at your feet
The fulness of my fame.
Now—now,—I scarce know which is best,
To strive, or lay me down and rest.

O winter in the sunless land !
O narrowed day ! O darker night !
O loss of all that let me stand
A giant in the fight !
I dwindle : for I see, and sigh,
A mated bird is more than I.

God bless you, Olive ! Even so
God bless your husband ! He, if true
To his sweet trust, to me will grow
Only less dear than you.
Heavens ! should he hurt his tender charge,
Why, hate is hot where love is large.

Yes—yes !—God bless your wedded lot !
My beautiful !—no—no—not mine !
I scarce know what is, what is not,
Only that I am thine ;—
Thine, thine, come aught, come all amiss.
No time, no fate, can alter this !

CCXXVI.

Strange? Yes! the human heart is subtle strange,
And, even when most stoutly ruddered, drives,
'Gainst winds that veer and over waves that change,
Unto some port, not that for which it strives.
Tides turn its track, storm-gusts extend its range,
The tempest strips it, and the lightning rives ;
Till, poor black hull, it seems itself to aid
Each howling buffet, and each watery raid.

CCXXVII.

When unto Olive Godfrid bade farewell,
Carrying the faithful pledge of her distress,
Still from his side unable to dispel
The dogging memory of despair's caress,
And all of sweet sad sorrow that befell,
Down to the edge of parting's wretchedness,—
His steps he bent to where, 'mid lordly lands,
An empty, roofless monastery stands.

CCXXVIII.

A river journeyeth past its ancient walls,
Whereon hoar ivy thrives and night-owls build.
Its only chant is now a waterfall's,
Which swells, and falls, and swells, as it is filled
With music from the hills. The cuckoo calls
Throughout moist May. When August woods are stilled
In sleepy sultriness, the stock-dove broods
Low to itself. The rest is solitude's.

CCXXIX.

But many a mile before the river sweeps,
With gentle curve, around the Abbey gray,
Straight through dense woods in whose umbrageous deeps
A mystic muteness lurks, it keeps its way.
Now through a throttling gorge it gurgling leaps,
Now flows, slow, smooth, silent as those that pray,
'Twixt sylvan sanctuaries, whose green aisles slope
Up to bare moors, with the bare sky for cope.

CCXXX.

And here it was, unwisely, Godfrid sought
Solace for joys which yesterday were wrecked,
But nothing found there, save the loss he brought.
For Nature is a mirror, to reflect
Man's many moods, faith, doubt, fear, fancy, aught
That may rejoice his spirit or deject,
And, as she back projects them, to infuse
Into their image her own lively hues.

CCXXXI.

Thus Olive, who seemed earthly fair when viewed
In her own lineaments, now she was glassed
In wood, and stream, and abbeyed solitude,
All known, all pictured loveliness surpassed.
Then, prompt Imagination's airy brood
Their immaterial textures wove and cast
Over the lustrous image, till the eyes
Of his strained soul outsoared realities.

CCXXXII.

And by this transcendental glamour buoyed
On those aërial waves that rock and nurse
The children born of Fancy's fruitful void,
He swathed their delicate frail forms in verse,
Which is itself illusion, and enjoyed
The deeper as the more our minds immerse
Themselves in fabled sea, or with feigned sails
Let our thoughts flit before fantastic gales.

CCXXXIII.

Who love not at first meeting love but ill ;
The dew is off the rose before 'tis plucked :
The sweetness foregone night's dark hours distil,
Is by familiar day, unheeded, sucked.
Then vague thirst, lassitude, and that weak will
Which weds us to the wonted, half-instruct
Our empty hands to cull the flower from whom
Hath passed for aye the dawn's delicious bloom.

CCXXXIV.

And Godfrid, who scanned first this perfect flower
With gaze of tranquil homage, could not now
Bring back the freshness of the faded hour.
In vain the passionate verse, the rhymèd vow !
This was but fancy's mist, the mere heat-shower
Which from imagination's sultry brow
Falls in quick heavy drops, to slowly clear
And leave behind a serene atmosphere.

CCXXXV.

But whilst imagination's torrid glow
Makes the near ether shimmer, how shall we,
Dazed by its heat, the true from specious know,
Or pierce the cheat of unreality?
And poets are so one with joy and woe,
So near in blood to all they hear or see,
That in their moods distempered they invest
Seeming with truth, and hug it as a guest.

CCXXXVI.

But Olive, though she too might boast t' have been Nurtured in Arcady, was woman first
And last of all things. With an ear akin
To each sweet sound that ever was rehearsed,
By bird or bard, on lyre or mandolin,
Withal, deep down within her heart she nursed
That passion for the actual and the real,
Which still remain the woman's true ideal.

CCXXXVII.

So every line by molten passion coined
In the chill mould of Godfrid's hollow song,
She to her life's most cherished tokens joined,
And secret wore, lest they should suffer wrong
From vulgar gaze, or haply be purloined
By envious hands, and not be hers for long.
Each wailing strophe, warbled by fancy's throat,
With her indelible heart's-blood she re-wrote.

CCXXXVIII.

And when her parents fain had brought the ring
Back to her hand, and sent the rhymes away,
She, like a gentle fearful-hearted thing
Whom motherhood makes fierce, stood dumb at bay,
Prompt to rebut, and ready e'en to spring,
Should any seek to make her prize their prey.
And in her eyes so wild a look she wore,
And in her mien such force, that they forbore.

CCXXXIX.

And as the time drew nigh for her to quit
For aye the fond familiar porch of home
For the vague land where unknown spectres flit,
She waxed as pale and restless as the foam
Frayed by sunk rocks whereon doomed vessels split.
From chamber unto chamber would she roam,
Vouchsafing broken answers now, now none,
And waiting for the setting of the sun.

CCXL.

But when the days of respite came to close,
And dawned through low dun clouds the bridal morn,
She mocked, but like to one who mocks at woes,
And laughed, but as they laugh who laugh for scorn.
They said she looked like a white shut-up rose
That chance hath burgeoned in a time forlorn,
When she stood veiled, and that she walked the nave
As straight and cold as coffin goes to grave.

CCXLI.

Then Autumn fired the woods, and crimson glowed
Fringed bole and feathered bough, and topmost spray,
Which, as fell in the shrivelled foliage, showed Roofless and bare, that late shut out the day :
While hurrying Winter's drifting storm-showers flowed
From hissing heavens, and slowly died away
The colour from drenched Nature's face. And then?
Black trunks, and dirgeful winds, and dripping fen.

END OF ACT I.

ACT II.

ACT II.

PROTAGONISTS:

LOVE—RELIGION.

PLACE:

SPIAGGIASCURA—MILAN—FLORENCE.

TIME:

MARCH 1858—MAY 1859.

ACT II.

I.

THERE is a little city in the South,
A silent little city by the sea,
Where a stilled Alpine torrent finds its mouth,
And billowy mountains subside smilingly.
It knows nor weeping skies nor dewless drouth,
No seasons, save when April's glancing glee
Slow steadies unto Summer's still-poised wing,
Or mimic Winter lifts the mask from Spring.

II.

Once on a time it was a famous city,
Home of urbane humanities and strife,
When men were knightly still, and women witty,
And court and camp with revelry were rife.
Now is it hushed as long-forgotten ditty,
Secluded alms-house of a bankrupt life,
Refuge for him, who, after days of riot,
Seeketh the safe monotony of quiet.

III.

No traveller's busy footstep cometh there,
No pallid form, more painlessly to die ;
No gainful barter thither doth repair ;
Even the boatman's oar and net pass by.
No clattering wheel and whip offend the air ;
Its streets but lead to mountain, sea, and sky,
And, when gaunt Winter stalks our shivering isle,
Bask, backed by hills, in ocean's rippling smile.

IV.

Within it is a lovelier little chapel
Than ever wealth commanded, genius planned,
For those famed shrines where pomp would vainly grapple
With art, to blend the beautiful and grand.
No gold adorns it, and no jewels dapple,
No boastful words attest the builder's hand ;
Sacred to prayer, but quite unknown to fame,
Maria Stella Maris is its name.

V.

Breaks not a morning but its snow-white altar
With fragrant mountain flowers is newly dight ;
Comes not a noon but lowly murmured psalter
Again is said with unpretentious rite ;
Its one sole lamp is never known to falter
In faithful watch through the long hush of night ;
From dawn till gloaming, open to devotion
Its portal stands, and to the swell of ocean.

VI.

Never did form more lightsome thread the dance
Than she who scours the hills to find it flowers ;
Never did sweeter lips weak ears entrance,
Than hers that pray, true to its striking hours ;
No hands so leal e'er decked the warrior's lance,
As those which tend its lamp as darkness lours ;
And never since dear Christ expired for man,
Had holy shrine so pure a sacristan.

VII.

Beyond its threshold, she nor hearth nor home,
As tender maidens wont, has e'er possessed :
Only a window just above the foam,
Less like a chamber than a sea-bird's nest.
No mother's voice forbids her steps to roam,
No father's joy enslaves her to his breast ;
And all but answer, ask you of her line,
"A daughter of the sunlight and the shrine."

VIII.

This year when streams enfranchised by the Spring
Came bounding to the ocean from the wolds,
Just as the callow broods were 'tempting wing,
And bleating voices heard about the folds,
And almond blossoms trusty news could bring,
Rude winds had scampered to their northern holds,
Within the chapel a strange face was seen,
Where for long days no stranger's foot had been.

IX.

When transubstantiated wine and bread
In mystic mass renewed the gainful loss
Of cruel Calvary, or tonsured head
O'er carven pulpit banned as worthless dross
All that the flesh can win, or doleful tread
Followed the tearful Stations of the Cross,
At Vespers' chant, at Benediction's prayer,
Or Quarant' Ore, was the stranger there.

X.

Presence so constant, she could scarcely fail,
Spite her own rapt devotion, to perceive ;
Since, ah ! as elsewhere, save the old and frail,
Or such as had some sudden cause to grieve,
Or when the Church's mandates must prevail,
Men came but seldom, and to quickly leave.
So she gave thanks, one callous bosom less
Should mitigate the Sacred Heart's distress.

XI.

Oft had he come, and knelt, and gone away,
And oft returned and often knelt again,
Before her eyes, which, too absorbed to stray,
And not avoiding, rarely met the ken,—
As though she scarcely knew their soul-lit ray
Had aught to do with, aught to fear from, men,—
Fell upon his, which, wont unseen to gaze,
Forgot to curb their burning look of praise.

XII.

Perhaps the woman's instinct failed in her.
Perhaps a maiden's bashfulness is more
A matron's lesson than our lips aver.
Shrank not her clear gray eyes his gaze before,
But dipping finger so as scarce to stir
The water in the stoup beside the door,
She held it out towards his without dismay,
Turned, knelt, and crossed herself, and went her way.

XIII.

Half a moon later, while the morn, yet early,
Smiled to the sound of reawakening trills,
When, though the mist, discomfited and surly,
Slowly retreating, hugged the higher hills,
On slopes below, the wild-rose blossoms pearly
Sparkled with scented dew their sleep distils,
And None's faint bells afar were heard to chime,
Their eyes and hands met for a second time.

XIV.

The bright incarnate spirit of the Morn,
Upon a stone mid-stream he saw her stand,
Atiptoe, straining at a snow-white thorn,
Whose boughs provoked, but still escaped her hand.
He, though of gracious courtesy inborn,
Yet by a sight so fairylike unmanned,
Sat like a statue that hath long while caught,
And keeps, immutable, some selfish thought.

XV.

The ripple of the streamlet past her feet,
White thorn above her, whiter robe around,
The linnet-pipings nigh, the distant bleat,
Spiral lark-music in the blue sky drowned,
Blending of all, melodious and sweet,
To superficial sense and soul profound,
Steeped him in such oblivious trance, indeed
He in her beauty quite forgot her need.

XVI.

Spite tantalizing nearness baffled still,
And peradventure, owing to his gaze,
Less skilful, so more jealous of her skill,
Afresh on straining tiptoe see her raise
Her lissom form, and girding maiden will
For hope forlorn against the churlish sprays,
Spring at a branch, that, with dense bloom oppressed,
Seemed as if sent to crown her earnest quest.

XVII.

She reached the bough, she clutched it, but, alack !
It yielded as but yields a half-bent bow,
Then with a sharp rebound sprang loosely back,
And lo ! the bloom came showering down like snow,
Dappling the dark stream with a milk-white track ;
But where it fell on her, you could not know.
And then she gave a foiled despairing cry,
That sounded half a prayer and half a sigh.

XVIII.

Swift at the sound from his fixed trance he woke,
And started up, and hastened to her aid ;
Sprang o'er the stepping stones, and virile broke
A loftier branch in lovelier bloom arrayed,
And, as he tendered, reverently spoke :
" I pray you, sinless maiden." And she said,
" Thanks, gentle sir ; my flowers are not for me,
But for our Lady's shrine afront the sea."

XIX.

" Then place these there," he said, " unless, indeed,
By my base touch their virtue be annulled ;
And when thou may'st for other sinners plead,
O breathe one orison for him who culled !
In this cold world, where sunless lives we lead,
Faith oft grows petrified, contrition dulled ;
But who would not feel blest to know that prayers
Mounted from lips like yours, to ears like hers ?

XX.

" And if such favour may a stranger ask,"
He begged in accents chivalrous and free,
That screened no foul presumption with fair mask,
" May I your pious steps accompany ?
I still perchance can aid you in your task,
To crown with flowers our Lady of the Sea ;
Or if that office but for you be meet,
May I not help to bear them to her feet ?"

XXI.

Hers was a heart that knew not to deny.
Like the benign Madonna she adored,
She looked down ever with consenting eye
And open tenderness, whoe'er implored.
So, though the candid gaze made sure reply,
From ready lips a gracious welcome poured.
"Come then," she said, "but quickly; we are late.
We must not make our loving Lady wait."

XXII.

So down the dewy hill they swift descended,
She treading first, he following fast behind;
Anon by tracks that deviously wended,
Now by smooth paths as straight as blows the wind;
Until the vineyards and the city blended,
And then those vanished, and their ears resigned
The mountain streams gurgling the pebbles o'er,
For the tired waves that fainted on the shore.

XXIII.

The little temple's doors stood open wide,
And all the place by sunshine was possessed,
From the groined roof which time had slowly dyed,
Down to the inlaid altar whitely dressed.
But the smooth walls that rose on either side,
Were marble; marble was the floor you pressed;
So that, withal, the spot seemed fresh and cool,
Even as shady grove or reedy pool.

XXIV.

Full on the left an antique pulpit rose,
Of structure quaint, and it was marble too,
Where hands long numb had carven, as they chose,
Odd allegories, fair and foul to view.
Here virgins, calm as newly fallen snows,
Bearing curved palms, and singing hymns to you ;
There long lank demons gnawing damnèd souls,
And bastard animals, and nightmare scrolls.

XXV.

But from these fancies twain you turned full soon,
For on the right the mild Madonna stood,
Down from her flowing hair to sandal-shoon
The mystic type of maiden motherhood.
Below her feet there curved a crescent moon,
And all the golden planets were her hood ;
In comely folds her queenly garb was moulded,
And over her pure breast her hands were folded.

XXVI.

She looked the most immortal mortal being
That ever yet descended from the skies,
As one who seemed to see all, without seeing,
And without ears to hear man's smothered sighs ;
With all earth's discords the one note agreeing,
Mid death and hate, a love that never dies ;
A tranquil silence amid fretful din,
And still the sinless confidant of sin.

XXVII.

And now the mountain maiden spread the store
Of prickly bloom besprent with pearly showers,
Culled by the stranger, on the marble floor,
And from her lap poured out her wealth of flowers :
Proud cyclamens on long lithe stems that soar,
Retiring violet that meekly cowers
'Mongst its green leaves, lilies that know not fear,
And that blue flower to parting lovers dear.

XXVIII.

All these, with many more, she deftly wrought
Into festoons and wreaths and posies fair ;
Then quick from inner sacristy she brought
Vases of simple clay, but structure rare,
And round the statue's base, as quick as thought,
Ranged them, till not a single spot seemed bare.
Whereon she back retired a little space,
And eyed her handiwork with anxious face.

XXIX.

“There, it is done, tho' ill. Now let us kneel,
And beg our gracious Mother to accept
Our tribute poor, since paid with homage leal.”
Therewith a pace or two she forwards stepped,
And her fair knees the marble fair did feel.
He just a little way behind her crept,
And, forcing his proud limbs to bend, obeyed
Her sovran word, and watched her as she prayed.

XXX.

Her hands were clasped, her eyes cast meekly down,
Down her smooth cheeks the tender teardrops stole,
And under kerchief white and bodice brown,
Heaved the pure tumults of her sinless soul.
Oh ! soon the Lady with the starry crown
Will sure, he thought, step from her flowery knoll,
And, subtly quickened by celestial charms,
Enfold this virgin form in virgin arms !

XXXI.

How long she thus remained, he noted not,
But, like to one whose count of time is stayed,
Still as she knelt, knelt rooted to the spot,
And when she rose, rose, following like a shade ;
And next, all dues of courtesy forgot,
Though he was bound to bid adieu, delayed ;
Until she courage took, and broke the spell
With the brief words : " I thank you, sir ; farewell ! "

XXXII.

" Farewell ! " he said,—her shadow even in speech ;
But the sad sound dissolved his sunny dream :
" Farewell, farewell ! but may we, I beseech,
Not meet once more beside the rippling stream,
Or on the grassy slope, or pebbly beach,
Or even here, which fitter still would seem ?
And ere I go, my loneliness to leaven,
Tell me by what sweet name you're known in Heaven ! "

XXXIII.

“Oh come, at your good will,” she frankly said,
“Where the hills rise, or where the long waves fall,
Or where the stream runs babbling o’er its bed,
Or in this chapel, dearest spot of all,
And you by me will still be welcomed,
If you, like me, will be my Lady’s thrall.
My name, sir, is Olympia.” “Godfrid mine.”
And so they parted, with no further sign.

XXXIV.

And she within the little chapel kept ;
But he went downward to the shining shore.
The sun far higher in the heavens had stept,
Withal to him it glowed not as before.
The morning’s magic from the hills had crept,
The little city a dimmed lustre wore ;
The waves had lost their music, and his breast
Heaved, ’neath a load of vacancy oppress.

XXXV.

When days and distance, sure if subtle balm
’Gan to infuse through Godfrid’s lone unrest,
And, though still timid, rudely-startled calm
Came back to brood again upon her nest,
He owned a something more than transient qualm,
Lest he had stirred the depths of Olive’s breast,
Only to leave them turbid, while his own
Once more had tranquil and transparent grown.

XXXVI.

For though what late had been was sly conceived
By that lewd Fate which fathers where it will
Its bastard accidents, withal he grieved
As though he were sole parent of the ill.
Thus mortals ever, by themselves deceived,
At point of peril plead their lack of skill
'Gainst the sharp tempter ; who, when peril fades,
Laugh at his edge, and blame their coward blades.

XXXVII.

So, ill at ease, and with his own heart vexed
Because in hours of sweetness, sweet no more,
It had forgotten its own bitter text,
And fallen so low, that feigned so high to soar,
Stern he arraigned it, asking it where next
It meant to lead him ; to what barren shore,
What land of fleshless spectres flitting dim
Past his ecstatic brain,—mere ghosts to him !

XXXVIII.

And when his heart eluded him, he becked
Unto him judgment, which made thus reply :
“Thou doest well still to be circumspect,
And not to topple in the bestial sty.
But though thou carry yet thy soul erect,
Beware lest thou shouldst empty-handed die,
And the Great Reaper find the ears all blind !
Wed some pure task, nor ever glance behind.”

XXXIX.

But he had fallen upon mournful times
When all great deeds were stagnant. Tales of fame
His isle still haunted, and in sounding rhymes
Were sometimes sung, barren of future aim.
The leaders of the land were supple mimes,
Greedy of passing plaudits, sold to shame ;
By whose base drugs, into deep slumber cast,
A once great realm lay pillowed on its past.

XL.

The sacred Sceptre's virtue was confessed
Therein no more ; no man no man obeyed.
They had disarmed Authority ; the best
Were worst of all, few, feeble, and afraid.
Religion, long inviolable guest,
A menial first, an alien now was made ;
There was no end, no means, to prompt or please,
Save poor brute toil, or rich imbruted ease.

XLI.

But he was of the strain of those who still
Are noble or are nothing ; who in days,
Empty of worthy purpose, curb their will,
And, though instinct with action, stand and gaze.
Secluded vale and solitary hill
Are more to them than ignominious praise ;
And o'er the world when night and dark are drawn,
Silent they wait till God brings back the dawn.

XLII.

So home he left, and o'er the vain-ploughed sea,
Through groaning cities, and long, silent fields,
Past poplars tall, and many a crocussed lea,
To where the vine its clustering fruitage yields,
Onwards he journeyed, until herb and tree
Still scantier grew, and their protecting shields
The Alps threw out, and on his cheek he felt
Airs that but blow from snows that never melt.

XLIII.

But not longwhile within the cold embrace
Of the unruffled mountains did he stay,
Nor by hushed lakes that still reflect their face,
Darkly by night, translucently by day,
But by snow-suckled torrents sought to trace
His devious, lone, and uninstructed way,
Until they led him to that tideless sea
That laps the shore of what was Italy.

XLIV.

And scarcely witting how, within a city
Himself he found where revelry was lord,
Where nets were spread sans piety or pity,
And kite and cushat lived in gay accord :
A place as fair as e'er was sung in ditty,
And soft as even southern seas afford ;
A smooth warm dimple upon Nature's cheek,
When northern skies loom chill and winds blow bleak.

XLV.

But not the waves that languished on the beach
In drowsy kisses, babbling words of love,
Nor scents exhaled from orange, almond, peach,
Whose fragile blooms softened the crags above,
No, nor the hues which baffle still the reach
Of pen and palette, delicate as the dove,
Could coax his feet to stay or loiter where
Man's deeds are foul as all, save him, is fair.

XLVI.

So to Spiaggiascura passed he on,
That silent little city by the shore,
Whence stir of busy life longwhile hath gone,
And where the laugh of youth is heard no more.
He fain earth's fardels ne'er again would don,
But henceforth only simple right implore
To sit i' the sun, and wise ensample win
From pale Lent lilies that nor toil nor spin.

XLVII.

But they who in this world of wasteful woe
Woo thrifty calm, search for the sophist's stone,
And never yet did craftiest heart below
Foil the fixed doom that bids men moil or moan.
Here, where he fondly deemed no mortal throe
Could a divine tranquillity dethrone,
The saddest conflict 'twas his lot to wage,
That blots with tears the dark-set human page.

XLVIII.

Since that auspicious morn whose brief delights
Had sent him silent to the sounding shore,
He wooed no longer nature's sounds and sights,
And found in solitude content no more.
But whether dawn would flush the eastern heights,
Or evening bell suspend the boatman's oar,
Still to Madonna's shrine his steps were turned,
Where his rare task still rarer wage had earned.

XLIX.

The tenderness which drenches the lone mind,
Insensibly as dew distilled at night,
Made him, of late, cast many a look behind
Of fondness towards a Creed abandoned quite.
He felt his hands clasped by a parent kind
In infant prayer ; he saw each dear old rite ;
He heard the hymns of childhood, and he breathed
The scent of flowers, with sacred incense wreathed.

L.

For not in scorn, but he, bowed-down and blenched,
Had passed out from the Temple. Ere he went,
With secret tears the altar-steps he drenched,
Aware he sped to utter banishment.
From home, hearth, Heaven, reluctant heart he wrenched,
The stern exiler of his past content ;
Bidding adieu to Faiths which, well he knew,
Cease not to comfort, ceasing to be true.

LI.

Nor passed he from his own to hostile camps,
Wearing with shameless pride the honours cheap
With which the rancorous renegado vamps
The rents in his old judgments, that still peep
Through the new arguments, nor flout the lamps
Of his first sanctuary, that he might reap
Light from their darkness for the later shrine ;
Denouncing damned what once he deemed divine.

LII.

No : but as one of knightly temper treats
Friends that have fallen away, once closely dear,
And, though no more their alien face he meets,
Thinks and speaks kindly of them, far or near,
So he, though bitter now their ancient sweets,
Did ever the old faith and ways revere,
Only withholding what might chance deceive
Those whom, withal, he studied not to grieve.

LIII.

And with this rule of chivalry was wed
The constant recollection that the wise,
The great, the good, the many-martyred dead,
Virgins with Heaven's light radiant in their eyes,
Doctors and Confessors with nimbused head,
Had firm on that foundation built the skies ;
That they who made him foolish, feeble, vile,
Cowered before That at which he durst not smile.

LIV.

To him, too, did it seem Rome's hoary Creed
Was still the trunk from which the rest had spread,
Dependent branches ; and if it indeed
Was slowly dying, they were already dead ;
And though weak souls, that still might shelter need
'Gainst Reason's glare, to leafless boughs o'erhead
Vainly would trust, they yet perhaps might find
Some screen within the old bole's weathered rind.

LV.

Thus with mute wisdom seated in his mind,
And tenderness chief tenant of his heart,
He left the wasteful, turbid strifes behind,
In which the understanding ne'er take part ;
And by his very loneliness inclined
To welcome a new anodyne for smart
Not yet quite old, he found his footsteps halt
Where Spiaggiascura fronts the waters salt.

LVI.

There found he all for which he long did crave :
Beauty, and solitude, and simple ways ;
The quiet-shining hills, the long lithe wave,
Now white-fringed, fretting into rough-curved bays,
Now swirling smoothly where the flat sand gave
A couch whereon to end its stormy days ;
Plain folk and primitive, made courteous by
Traditions old ; and a cerulean sky.

LVII.

The worship of the place, like all beside
In it, was old, and had the peace of eld.
No strident sects each other's God defied,
But one sole flock the selfsame gospel held,
Sang the selfsame sweet hymns, and side by side
Besought one Heaven to have their woes dispelled ;
Before the same dread Mystery crouched and wept,
And said one common prayer before they slept.

LVIII.

In sooth there was no other faith to them
Than this one, whose original they drew
From herds of Japhet and from tents of Shem,
An old, old revelation, ever new.
It was a creed to comfort, not condemn,
To soothe the many, not to puff the few,
No brand of hellish discord, but a star,
Whose tremulous radiance linked the near and far.

LIX.

No granite doctrines, moulded to exclude
One half mankind, their starving souls shut in :
Their dogmas, like their wants, were few and rude,
But such as by the wise not scorned had been.
They deemed that life and death are still at feud,
That earth is choked with sorrow, wrong, and sin,
And, though the Just Judge may weak man condemn,
That Christ hath died and Mary prays for them.

LX.

The boastful notes by upstart Science blown
Over its hollow victories, the lewd jeers
By once divine Philosophy, carnal grown,
At the pure secret of the Silent Years,
The jarring notes raised round the Eternal Throne
By rival rabbles, never reached their ears.
They were content to know that restiff Man
Is urged towards goal too far for him to scan.

LXI.

In this new home, the fretful or the proud
Had trivial deemed, he with a windless will
Let his soul rest, as rests a summer cloud
On the soft summit of a rounded hill.
He joined the little city's mimic crowd
On early market morns, when down each rill
That marked a mountain track, with faces brown,
Tall peasant folk came winding to the town.

LXII.

But long before the sun was hot and high,
These up the hills again were mounting slow,
And soon their forms were lost in cleft and sky.
Then Godfrid through the quiet streets would go,
Greeting and greeted by chance passer-by,
Or sometimes halting where, with locks of snow,
A bent old dame sate spinning at her door,
Thence saunter downwards to the vacant shore.

LXIII.

But now the spot endeared to him before
By fair simplicity and lonely grace,
Had to his heart grown dearer more and more,
Since he had gazed upon Olympia's face,
Had seen her with up-raised eyes adore
The sinless Mother in the sacred place,
And in his arms had borne her garlands sweet,
Swift down the hill following her fawn-like feet.

LXIV.

He thought how good, how restful sure 'twould be,
How cool of shade when fierce suns glare and scorch,
What placid haven from a plunging sea,
If he within the little temple's porch
Might dwell in reverent quietude, while she,
Purer of heart, still fed the altar's torch,
And live, despite his misbelieving leaven,
Almost as near to her, as she to Heaven.

LXV.

And thus the Past would not be all disowned,
Nor he upon a trackless future tossed,
But firm on earth while sentiment sate throned,
Might in the clouds sail speculation, lost
To all save kindred ken, and, unbemoaned
By timid voice, the Unknown Powers accost :
Like that wise bird which shrills the skies with sound,
But nestles humbly, warmly, on the ground.

LXVI.

O Love ! thou specious advocate, that find'st
A multitude of reasons for thy madness !
Thou heedless libertine, that rashly bind'st
Thy lasting soul to transitory gladness !
Why is 't, self-executioner, thou blind'st
Thine own bright eyes unto a coming sadness,
And with thine own white hands dost dig the grave
Where the worms riot and the grief-winds rave !

LXVII.

Is 't not enough that thou should'st bear thy doom,
Nor wreath thy fated head with festal flowers ?
Oh, quickly make a pillow of the tomb,
And hear the pattering of the summer showers,
And list the falling of the summer bloom,
Thou half-asleep all through the sleepy hours !
Dream, unfledged innocent ! nor wake to know
The full-blown joy that withers into woe !

LXVIII.

Alas ! alas ! the wisdom of the wise
The unwise helps not. Each fresh mortal tread
Walks this long-hackneyed world with wondering eyes,
And stumbles livingly among the dead.
Nay, we ourselves ourselves in vain advise,
Nor doth old folly folly new bestead.
Experienced man, experience still awaits,
Remains a novice, death initiates.

LXIX.

Thus Love, the adviser now of Godfrid's breast,
Found him with reasons ; and he subtly blent
With the swift tide where impulse onward pressed,
The steadier flow of stately argument.
That which was sweetest quickly seemed the best ;
And judgment, cap in hand to passion's bent,
Decked its despotic path with wisdom's saws,
And played the escort to its self-applause.

LXX.

Yes ! it was Love that had him in its toils,
Him, philosophic gazer, wary, grave,
That selfsame simple love whose cunning foils
The warrior's breastplate and the hermit's cave ;
Enters the hut where the poor peasant boils
His meagre broth, unto the tethered slave
Gives more than freedom, and to loftiest crown
Brings that for which who would not lay it down !

LXXI.

Yes ! he who passed with bosom unbetrayed
Through fashion's desert, level, dewless, drear,
Where pleasure's levies crouch in ambushade,
And use the poisoned senses for a spear,
Straight fell a captive to this mountain maid,
Whose gaze and voice as modest were and clear
As hill-stream's purl and glance, and whose sole guile
Was pity's tear and innocency's smile.

LXXII.

In the lone night, when muffled footsteps flit
Along the darkened corridors of sense,
And thoughts, our very own, career in it,
Since quite shut out will's alien influence,
His hunting fancy would no dreams admit
Save such as should in her dim form commence,
Or, doubling back, with trail still incomplete,
To the white hawthorn, finish at her feet.

LXXIII.

And when he woke, she was already there,
Waiting with maiden mien and speechless guise,
The dawn and dew all shining on her hair,
And heaven's eternal freshness in her eyes.
But quick the unfed fancy breathed a prayer
For presence real, which alone satisfies
The craving gaze of fondness, and he chid
The sluggard morn for its too sleepy lid.

LXXIV.

He saw her with the bursting sunlight come
Over the hills, over the mountains gray ;
He heard her in the rising dawn-wind's hum,
He felt her in the warmth of growing day.
She sang to him when all the groves were dumb,
Peopled the pine-slope's solitary way,
Walked the long sands, leaving no print the while,
And in the rippling wave infused her smile.

LXXV.

She had become the centre of his seeing,
The perfect outmost circle of desire,
Whereto each separate radius of his being
Led, and beyond which cared not to aspire,
Each ending there, and each with each agreeing :
To life's eccentric wheel the forceful tire,
To shape and bind it, that it yet might roll,
Swiftly or slowly, to some needed goal.

LXXVI.

Thus whilst his heart grew rooted to the spot,
The sea lay dimpling with perpetual smiles,
Calm as a babe that sleeps within its cot,
And hushed as lake, dotted with fairy isles.
The winds were all shut up in Æolus' grot,
Heaven free from cloud that darkens or defiles,
And not the frailest blossom fluttered down
From drooping branch within the tiny town.

LXXVII.

But when a sunny sevensnight had passed,
Up from the south there came a trailing cloud,
And in its train an ever-rising blast,
That soon was singing high in sail and shroud ;
And, as it waxed, the sky grew overcast,
Lurid and low ;—whereat the breakers proud
Curved their strong crests, flung up their forelocks hoar,
And, madly rearing, plunged towards the shore.

LXXVIII.

And still as waned the day the wrathful ocean
Higher and higher rose, and to and fro
The slippery billows slid in shapeless motion,
Now dense and dark, now shivered into snow ;
Then once again as thick as hell-hag's potion,
Clotted with briny litter from below :
Like leaden coffins yawning first to sight,
Then swiftly hidden with fringed shrouds of white.

LXXIX.

And where the sun would have been seen to set,
If sun had been, the sky was darkened most,
And drooped the welkin lower and lower yet,
As Night stole on without her starry host.
Anon, with flapping wings and stormy threat,
Foul seagulls came, and screamed along the coast ;
Then utter dark closed in, before, behind,
And over all loud growled the wolfish wind.

LXXX.

'Twas midnight, and the waves were rolling in ;
But in the little town were none who slept,
Save dotage deaf or childhood free from sin.
Pale in their beds, the rest scared vigil kept,
Crossing themselves, and listening to the din ;
And, as it swelled, the women wailed and wept,
And wrung their hands, thinking of those at sea,
Then hushed their babes, waked by the threnody.

LXXXI.

But one there was who neither wept nor prayed,
Nor sought a wakeful mockery of repose,
Was by the restless waves unresting made,
And whose wild pulse still with the billows rose.
He, through the darkness, lone and unafraid,
Courted the storm and braved the tempest's blows,
Heard the rough surf's reverberating beat,
And felt the firm shore shaken 'neath his feet.

LXXXII.

When all at once he marked a steady star
Spangle the gloom,—small, but surpassing bright,
Which seemed to shine nor near nor yet afar,
But glowed suspended on the breast of night.
'Twas luminous as clear-faced planets are,
And as he stood awondering if it might
Be Neptune's sign, it large and larger gleamed,
And o'er the sea in silvery arrows streamed.

LXXXIII.

And then he knew it was no star of heaven,
But that fair Stella Maris, Star of the Sea,
Which, steadier far than all the wandering Seven,
Though nigher earth, burns more celestially ;
Star which no clouds can veil, no storm-mists leaven,
And which, with patient hand and suppliant knee,
The maiden of the shrine, Madonna's flower,
Tended within the lonely chapel's tower.

LXXXIV.

It led him on ; he left the bounding tide,
And to the silent portal nearer drew,
Until no more the star could be descried,
And the low porch hid the tall tower from view.
But still, as erst, across the waters wide
Its undimmed ray a broad bright pathway threw :
A tapering wedge of light that clave in twain
The obdurate dense night, and pitchy main.

LXXXV.

But now the chapel's doors were closed and barred ;
So on the smooth cold steps he sat him down,
And pitying thought of the stout hearts that warred
With the fell surge, or dropped their hold to drown.
Ah me ! but life is dear, and death is hard,
Though, when life smiles, we only fret and frown ;
From its full breast, sick nurselings, turn and cry,
To clutch it wildly as the stream runs dry.

LXXXVI.

So for awhile he mused. But soon his brain,
Careless to solve, let go the tangled theme ;
And then strange thoughts, a desultory train,
Unbidden came and went, as in a dream.
Now he was tossing on the seething main,
Now 'neath a dome, lit by one pale lamp's gleam,
Standing 'mong worshippers composed in prayer ;—
And then, anon, whirled thro' the murky air.

LXXXVII.

How long he thus sat dream-bound, could be known
To darkness only. But at length he heard
A sound that neither was the billow's moan,
Nor stress of storm, nor scream of obscene bird.
The porch behind him shook, and the numb stone
Whereon he sat, it seemed to him, was stirred ;
And,—looking up, just as one startled would,— Madonna in the open doorway stood.

LXXXVIII.

Madonna's very self, in white arrayed,
With flowing hair, and hands o'er bosom crossed,
Mute lips that moved not, though the whole soul prayed,
And gaze in pitying contemplation lost ;
Who, by divine decree immaculate made,
Yet whom the most seared sinner may accost,
Had come with mildly pacifying form
To lull the waters and appease the storm.

LXXXIX.

So, for an instant, to his sight it seemed ;
But, by his fantasy not long beguiled,
He saw it was Olympia's self that beamed
Upon the darkness and the waters wild.
Yet was she heavenly as the thing he'd dreamed,
As pure, as potent, pitiful, and mild ;
And at her beck he looked to see dismissed
The bellowing winds, and the loud billows whist.

XC.

But still the storm raged on. "Olympia ! see,
See, I am here !" he said, still nestling down ;
And when she heard him not, first on one knee
He raised himself, and touched her flowing gown.
"Godfrid !" she cried, "Godfrid ! oh, come with me,
Come quick within, and pray for those that drown !
In vain I watch and sue with many a tear ;
But if we both should pray, She still will hear."

XCI.

"She hear !" he pleaded ; "hearken rather thou !"
And clutched her robe, and crouched low at her feet ;
"For never storm broke over failing prow,
As on my breast life's stifling billows beat.
A long-tossed mariner I, behold me now
Straining to shore, craving for haven meet.
Oh, lift me, feeble, from these fearful waves,
And fold me, shipwrecked, to the heart that saves !"

XCII.

"O Godfrid, talk not wildly thus !" she said ;
"I will be tender, so you will be calm ;
There is no woe can not be comforted,
And for worst wounds Heaven holds some bless'd balm.
I ne'er wore heavy heart or aching head,
But that I found, in psalter or in psalm,
Or silent mental prayer, or simple beads,
A swift and certain medicine for my needs."

XCIII.

“ Ah ! but,” he answered, “ mine a deeper woe,
Than bead, or prayer, or psalm can hope to probe.
I at my mother’s knee was taught to throw
Myself on Heaven, and cling to Mary’s robe ;
But, like yon waves that wander to and fro,
Homeless and aimless through the whirling globe,
I flow now where Fate bids me, nor demand
Why there I ebb, and here I hug the strand.

XCIV.

“ Still to the Sovereign Will I humbly bow,
If I no longer grace or gifts implore ;
And, more than heavenly seraph, spurn not thou !
Or Hope will die, where Faith had died before.
And see, Olympia !—is ’t not so ?—I now
But seek one intermediary more.
Thou through Madonna dost thy wants prefer ;
Well, I will pray to thee, then thou to Her.”

XCV.

Then from her feet he rose, and sought her face ;
But on what altered sight his vision fell !
’Twas buried in her hands ; withal apace
Through them he saw the bitter tear-drops well.
And as he strove, with reverent embrace
And tender words, her bosom’s sobbing swell
Somewhat to soothe, “ Not pray ! Not pray !” she cried .
Then bared her gaze, and wailed out, streaming-eyed :

XCVI.

“Alas! that ever by the rippling stream,
'Neath the white-blossoming thorn, our steps did meet!
Alas, alas, that I to you should seem
Winsome, and you to me, undreamt-of sweet!
I thought you loved Madonna; was 't a dream
That you did carry garlands to her feet?
I told you—did I not?—I was her child,
Hers only, wholly, till you came and smiled.

XCVII.

“And I am Hers—not yours, not yours indeed.
Nay, urge not, speak not, Godfrid! for your tongue
Is as a dagger, from whose strokes I bleed.
Hither return when the first lark hath sung,
And I meanwhile will watch, and weep, and plead
You yet may pray, e'en as you prayed when young.
There! Go and rest! And in her hallowed keeping Madonna hold you, while your cares are sleeping.”

XCVIII.

She ceased, and with the cadence seemed to raise
Her hands to bless, whereat he bowed his head.
But when again he craved her lenient gaze,
The doors were closed, the angelic vision fled.
Alone and outcast in the moaning ways
He stood, with winds and billows for his bed:
It seemed as Heaven itself had thrust him out
To utter darkness, for the fiends to flout.

XCIX.

Radiant with smiles, with limbs of rosy hue,
Up from Tithonus' couch Aurora came,
Her golden chariot scattering sparks of dew,
Her glowing coursers breathing genial flame ;
And, as of old, her glorious retinue
Of youth and beauty trumpeted her fame.
Fleet from her presence fled the winds ; the waves
Crouched at her feet, owning themselves her slaves.

C.

You cannot kill the Gods. Their shadows still
The cherished rites of Pagan eld renew,
Haunt the cool grot, or scour the thymy hill,
And in the woods their wanton sports pursue.
This very morn I heard Pan's pastoral quill,
And tracked Diana's sandals o'er the dew,
Caught dimpled Venus veiled in feathery foam,
And Faunus scampering to his sylvan home.

CI.

And if Jove prove not the last god dethroned,
But Heaven at length Olympus' fate should feel,
Deem not, withal, its choirs shall be disowned,
Or dumb oblivion o'er its seraphs steal.
Still shall calm Stephen smile on martyrs stoned,
Fair sinners still to Magdalen appeal ;
Cecilia's touch still wake the sacred lyre,
And lamblike Agnes spotless loves inspire.

CII.

Such were the thoughts that flashed thro' Godfrid's brain,
But,—since heart-sick,—confusedly and dim,
When yet once more he slowly sought to gain
Olympia's side, as she had bidden him.
There was a silence on the shimmering main,
And the white city did in sunshine swim ;
You would have thought the griefs that make men gray,
Had, like the storm, been spirited away.

CIII.

The chapel doors stood open wide ; the air,
Within, was sweet and fragrant as the clove.
Gold-dappled bees were humming everywhere,
Fancying Madonna's shrine a honeyed grove ;
And, overhead, fluttered by coming care,
A little bird flew to and fro, and strove
To find some niche secure from ravage rude,
Where it might build its nest, and rear its brood.

CIV.

Over the marble pavement pure as snow,
Faint yellow butterflies flickered, gaily dight,
Whose shifting shadows you might scarcely know
From golden flaws within the spotless white.
But for the rest, around, above, below,
There was no breath, no stir, no sound, no sight ;
It was as quiet as could quiet be,
And all the place seemed lapped in vacancy.

CV.

The glamour that in silent beauty dwells,
Chased for awhile the want his heart was tearing ;
But soon he felt, despite its gracious spells,
The minutes lone were somewhat sadly wearing ;
Till from the sacristy, with snow-white bells,
Olympia came, a lily lilies bearing,
And, having laid them at Madonna's feet,
Gazed on him salutation sad but sweet.

CVI.

On her young cheeks no more that rose did blow
Such as from hedgerows in lush June you pull,
But in its stead, her face was washed with woe,
Though of that sort which maketh beautiful ;
Her large orbs, swart and satin as the sloe,
Whose lustrous light no sorrow could annul,
Yet wore a strangely grave and settled look,
Like a dark pool, and not the laughing brook.

CVII.

"Tell me my fate !" he cried, seizing her hand.
"Thy fate !" she answered, "tell me rather mine !
Bend pride's stiff knees ; no longer grace withstand,
And I will be for ever, ever thine.
If not, then Heaven hath this dear bounty banned,
And my poor heart must thy rich heart resign.
I am Madonna's child, come life what may,
Come death ! O Godfrid ! kneel with me and pray !"

CVIII.

There was a moment's hush, brief but intense,
Long as perhaps a billow waits to break.
Then, with a heaving of the bosom, whence,
More than the lips, the answer came, he spake,
And said "I cannot!" frightening thus suspense,
Which fled, and left a more enduring ache.
But yet he clutched her hand, as, in the wave,
Men bent on death still strive themselves to save.

CIX.

And as he held her thus, her sight grew dim,
Her other hand on Mary did she lay,
And turned from him to her, from her to him,
As soul and sense alternately would sway ;
Like one of those primeval seraphim,
Pure spirit, but love-chained to a child of clay,
Immortal born, with just that mortal leaven,
Seduced to earth, but quick recalled to Heaven.

CX.

When sudden o'er her pallid infirm gaze,
Distracted form, and hesitating gait,
There rushed a quick resolve, such as betrays
The heart when hope at bay grows desperate.
Lifting her hand from the cold statue's base,
With it she grasped the arm that held its mate,
And, panting, said, "Wilt with me hence repair
Where Milan's spires go up to heaven like prayer?"

CXI.

“Seraph!” exclaimed he, “could’st thou name the spot,
Asia’s cold peaks, or Afric’s burning beach,
Cave, steppe, or desert, whither I would not
Follow thy form, as silence follows speech?
Seek ocean’s bed, it swift shall be my grot;
Ascend to Heaven, I then will strive to reach.
But tell me, with that tongue that chaseth woe,
Still as I hark, why would’st to Milan go?”

CXII.

“In Milan’s busy ways and sinful crowd,
There riseth up, as I have heard, a pile,
Whose topmost pinnacles are lost in cloud,
And, ere the mountains, catch the Orient’s smile.
The gorgeous palaces that house the proud,
Yield to its spacious nave and thick-trunked aisle,
And wealth and pomp of courts are sordid things,
To its rich worship of the King of kings.

CXIII.

“And learn’d men its famous Chapter fill,
Learn’d and breathed through by the Holy Ghost,
Chief among whom, in days they talk of still,
This little town could for its pastor boast.
He in my budding soul was first to instil
Sweet precepts, tidings from the heavenly host,
Love of my dear Madonna, and a life
That never thought to find in fondness, strife.

CXIV.

“Come, let us go, and, if you will, afoot,
And to that far-off goal make pilgrimage ;
And our joint journey in your heart may put
Wise counsel, and your obdurate doubts assuage.
If not, then he—for I will set him to 't,—
With heavenly arguments and reasons sage
Shall melt the ears which to my prayers are cold,
And win you back, lost sheep, to Christ's dear fold.”

CXV.

There is a joy when hearts that beat together
Sit under blossoming trees when spring is new ;
There is a joy in summer's sultry weather,
When leafy boughs bend over lovers true ;
There is a joy, deep in the autumn heather
To crouch with one who's all the world to you ;
And joy there is, 'mid winter nights and storms,
When gleams the firelight on two happy forms.

CXVI.

But, oh ! the dearest, deepest joy that ever
Thrilled thro' the sentient veins' abounding tide,
Is when two souls whom custom cannot sever,
Yet did not link, set out to wander wide
Through this broad world, whose snares in vain endeavour
Their hands, hearts, hopes, to loosen or divide ;
Who cling the closer, further as they roam,
And in each smiling valley find a home.

CXVII.

For then the sunset takes a deeper dye
From the warm flush of cheek that touches cheek ;
The fair far landscape fairer grows,—when nigh,
The palm that presses, lip that forbears to speak ;
Blendeth with each soft gale the amorous sigh,
The clasping kiss transfigures cloud and peak ;
Nature and Love, seen in each other's eyes,
Avouch the spell which lifts and glorifies.

CXVIII.

Now woke the morn, pure as a maiden wakes,
And, while the world still slept, forth hand in hand
Went Godfrid and Olympia. Lagging flakes
Of silvery mist, by light gales curled and fanned,
Fled up the hills ; from feathery-foliaged brakes
Rang out melodious matins ; on the sand,
And on the sea, glistened a pearly dew ;
And, over both, bright bent the heavens blue.

CXIX.

He had a leathern satchel at his back,
And in her breast a missal small she bore ;
And, their sole burdens these, they took the track
That lies between the mountains and the shore.
On the smooth main was many a white-sailed smack,
Upon the hillside many a ruin hoar ;
With many a fluttering wing the air was sown,
But on the mountain road themselves alone.

CXX.

Soon as they reached the last and loftiest crest
Whence could Spiaggiascura be descried,
Halting, they took their first brief snatch of rest,
By a bright well that bubbled at their side.
There, as she said a prayer within her breast,
He gazed exulting o'er the prospect wide ;
And then the twain, hands linking as before,
Strode on, nor saw the little city more.

CXXI.

Through smiling tracts, close fenced from winds and snows,
Fed, all the year, by the sun's fostering ray,
And kissed by every vernal gale that blows,
Tracts that are Eden still, their journey lay.
Full on their left the eternal mountains rose,
Upon the right ranged headland, creek, and bay,
And jutting promontories, round which the bright
Blue ocean ended in a fringe of white.

CXXII.

Far up the hills were smooth steep pastures green,
Whence tinkling herd-bells fitful reached the ear ;
And in the rough and bosky clefts between,
Browsed shaggy goats, clambering where all was sheer :
While, though unheard, and only faintly seen,
There a thin silvery thread, a white speck here,
Dashed the precipitous torrent, soon to flow
Glibly adown the gradual slopes below :

CXXIII.

The smiling slopes with olive groves bedecked,
Now darkly green, now, as the breeze did stir,
Spectral and white, as though the air were flecked
With elfin branches tipped with gossamer ;
And then so faint, Godfrid could scarce detect
Which the gray hillside, which the foliage fair ;
Until once more it dense and sombre grew,
Again to shift, just as the zephyr blew.

CXXIV.

Nigher their ken were mulberry, fig, and vine,
This linked to those in many a long festoon,
'Neath which the wise, when days are long, recline,
Reaping the hours in a deep golden swoon.
The tendrils yet had but begun to twine
Round the pale stems that would be hidden soon ;
But, in the cradling furrows lodged between,
Peeped sprouting maize, and grasses newly green.

CXXV.

And here and there with glistering lemon bowers
The lower landward terraces were crowned,
Or shapely orange groves, whose fragrant flowers
Make of the land a bride the whole year round.
Pink petals from the almonds fell in showers,
Weaving a vernal carpet for the ground ;
And o'er the walls peered tufts of yellow broom,
And oleanders reddening into bloom.

CXXVI.

And ever and anon some quiet town
Came into view, and thro' it straight they passed,
Though once perhaps its name had won renown
In this strange world, where nothing great doth last.
With braided hair, bronzed limbs, and girded gown,
Ranged round a fountain flowing clear and fast,
Their eyes as bright as day, yet dark as night,
Stood stalwart women, washing linen white.

CXXVII.

And round the open thresholds children fair,
Happy and lithe as lizards, romped and ran,
Their grandams sitting by in sunny chair ;
But, in the ways, never a sign of man.
He was away, driving the ox-drawn share,
Trimming the vine-clasped elm to shapely span,
Or 'mong his maize in many a trivial course
Scattering the rampant torrent's forward force.

CXXVIII.

In each broad market-place a church there was,
With campanile soaring straight in air,
And open door for whosoe'er should pass ;
And once or twice, to say a hasty prayer,
Olympia stole within, though he, alas !
Without remained, mute in the noontide glare.
But ne'er a shrine they saw which, to their mind,
Was half so fair as that they'd left behind.

CXXIX.

When had the sun its upward journey ta'en,
They sat them down and made their mid-day meal,
The mountains at their back, in front the main,
Those gray and calm, this flashing like burnished steel.
High up in heaven was neither cloud nor stain,
And Godfrid's lips could scarce the thought conceal,
How blest 'twould be each alien faith to smother,
And worship only Nature and each other.

CXXX.

'Twas Nature gave the simple meal they took,
Sitting in sunshine-shadow side by side.
A juicy orange, which from branch he shook
O'erhead, for her to daintily divide,
Last year's crisp almonds, water from the brook,
And bread from out his pack, their wants supplied.
Then rising up, they left their humble feast,
And turned once more their footsteps to the east.

CXXXI.

Soon, for awhile, the sea got lost to view,
Since landward more the hilly pathway wound,
Till among dusky pine-slopes stern of hue,
Which shut the sunlight out, themselves they found.
Right into heaven the shaggy summits grew ;
Grimly below them, yawned ravines profound,
Wherethro' swift torrents a rough pathway tore,
Filling the sombre silence with their roar.

CXXXII.

But by degrees the black pass broadened out,
On them once more the welcome sunshine streamed,
And budding larches, dotted sparse about,
'Mong the dark firs like fairy foliage gleamed.
In smooth green valleys shepherd boys did shout
To heedless flocks and herds that browsed and dreamed ;
Torrent no more, the stream beneath them flowed,
Devious yet smooth, e'en as their mountain road ;

CXXXIII.

Seeking a softly undulating plain
With straggling red-roofed hamlets thick bestrewed,
Whence, as the light of day began to wane,
Ave Maria rang from belfries rude.
The air, the hills, the re-appearing main,
Nature and man, confessed eve's tender mood ;
And every bosom in that region fair,
All, saving one alone, o'erflowed with prayer.

CXXXIV.

For at the foot of a tall roadside cross,
Whereon the martyred Godhead patient hung,
And round whose base soft-greenly grew the moss,
By hill-dews fed, herself Olympia flung,
And, like to one who mourns some bitter loss,
Yet hides the grief wherewith the heart is wrung,
There silently to Heaven her vows preferred,
Yet because mute, oh, not less surely heard !

CXXXV.

But when once more she rose up to her feet,
Still at his side to bravely trudge along,
Her heart, he saw, with quicker pulses beat,
And lo! she brake, unbidden, into song.
It was a melody unearthly sweet,
Taught her, it seemed, by the celestial throng;
And thus her voice, as ceased the belfries' clang,
Like woodland notes among the mountains rang.

I.

Oh, Mary Mother, full of grace,
Above all other women blest,
Through whose pure womb our erring race
Beholds its sin-born doom redressed,

Pray for us!

Thou by the Holy Ghost that wert
With every heavenly gift begirt,
Thou that canst shield us from all hurt,
Pray for us! Pray for us!

2.

Tower of David, Ivory Tower,
Vessel of Honour, House of Gold,
Mystical Rose, unfading flower,
Sure refuge of the unconsolated,

Pray for us!

Mirror of Justice, Wisdom's Seat,
Celestial shade 'mid earthly heat,
The sinner's last and best retreat,
Pray for us! Pray for us!

3.

O thou of Heaven that art the gate,
That to the feeble strength dost bear,
To whom no outcast turns too late,
E'en when thy Son is deaf to prayer,
Pray for us !

O Morning Star, to chase the dark,
Cause of our joy 'mid care and cark,
Thou of the Covenant the Ark,
Pray for us ! Pray for us !

4.

Bright Queen of the angelic choir,
Of patriarchs, prophets, worshipped Queen !
Queen of the martyrs proved by fire,
And Queen of confessors serene ;
Queen of the apostolic train,
Queen that o'er all the saints dost reign,
O Queen conceived without a stain !
Pray for us ! Pray for us !

CXXXVI.

So ceased the strain, and with it ceased the day.
The mountains slowly wrapped themselves in night ;
Far off, the silent sea gloomed cold and gray,
Sky-sundered by one long low line of white.
Over the vale, far down, a flat mist lay,
Which for a phantom lake bewrayed the sight ;
And louder now they heard the watchdogs bark,
And cataracts dashing downwards through the dark.

CXXXVII.

Therefore with eager eyes and quickened pace
Descried they twinkling lights not far ahead ;
But many a zigzag yet had they to trace,
Descending ever, ere their hopes were fed.
At length they heard the voices of the place,
Sought out the inn, and craved for board and bed ;
Two little sleeping chambers side by side,
And what rude fare the mountains might provide.

CXXXVIII.

It seemed to both a very rare repast,
For 'twas the first they had together ta'en
'Neath roof-tree snug, which shuts out sun and blast,
And from strange eyes screens many a happy twain,
Whose secret joy, too lovely did it last,
Hath, ah too oft ! an ambush proved for pain.
But though their hearts no raptures wild might own,
They found it very sweet to be alone.

CXXXIX.

Yet as that day full many a league their feet
Had traversed, and would morn bring many more,
Olympia early rose from fire-side seat.
Reverent, he saw her to her chamber door,
Kissed her pure hand, and wished her slumbers meet ;
Then, to the warm hearth fed by pine logs hoar
Returning, sat him down, and by their light
Mused, mute and mournful, far into the night.

CXL.

But she, when in the little room shut in,
First, on her knees, her prayers to Heaven addressed ;
These said, her simple gown she did unpin,
And of their robes her modest limbs divest.
Some mountain jonquils that had gathered been
By Godfrid, fondly to her lips she pressed ;
Then on the pillow laid her weary head,
And guardian angels gathered round the bed.

CXLI.

So for three days they journeyed, till they came
Where once-proud Genoa sits beside the sea,
Striving her antique temper yet to tame
To the stern bidding of the days that be :
Ghost of gay Eld, the same yet not the same,
As when she shone, beautiful, brave, and free,
Her airy pennon flouting every strand,
And Neptune's trident glittering in her hand.

CXLII.

But with the breaking of another morn,
They rose in haste and travelled with the crowd,
Roaring through tunneled hill, and loudly borne
On wings of wind past leagues of land and cloud.
Now the Ligurian hoed his patch of corn,
Then 'mid his vines the Lombard peasant ploughed ;
Till, with mid-afternoon, they could descry
The pinnacles of Milan prick the sky.

CXLIII.

And soon, once more afoot, their steps were bent
Through intersecting streets whose broad slant eaves,
Stretching athwart the footway, made a tent,
'Gainst the hot sun, almost as cool as leaves.
It seemed that the whole city with them went ;
And when they reached the piazza that receives
Many a convergent way, a mighty crowd
Streamed up the steps of the cathedral proud.

CXLIV.

So, never halting in the glowing square
A moment e'en, though the stupendous fane,
Flamboyant oriel, pinnacles poised in air,
One after one the eye would count in vain,
Bold-flying buttress, tall shaft tapering fair,
And fretted front, might well their gaze detain,
For the main door they made with all the folk,
Till on their ears the pealing organ broke.

CXLV.

A moment more, and lo ! they stood within !
A cry of wonder from Olympia burst ;
But on the instant seeing that He, whom sin
Doomed to dire death upon the rood accurst,
Shone on the altar, veiled by mystery thin,
Straight knelt she down, and, soon in prayer immersed,
Forgot the crowd, long aisles, and columns tall,
While Godfrid gazed and marvelled at it all.

CXLVI.

Each valid foot of transept, nave, and aisle,
Was dense with living things absorbed in prayer ;
Young men and maidens, children without guile,
Gray sires with flowing beards and bosoms bare ;
Smooth sinless faces here, that seemed to smile,
E'en as they prayed, with eyes soft-closed ; and there,
Hard furrowed visages down which the tears
Flowed from the brackish fount of desert years.

CXLVII.

With comely kerchief crossed o'er bosom brown,
The humble peasant fingered her worn beads,
Made at her side her youngsters nestle down,
And told Madonna of her simple needs.
Next her, a dainty dame of Milan town,
Voluptuous e'en as southern rapture breeds,
Bewailing in the dust her too frail breast,
Begged Christ to be her lover and sole guest.

CXLVIII.

And many a tonsured head was there, that bore
The ascetic cowl, surmounting garments strict ;
Here the brown serge the loving Francis wore,
There the black robes of active Benedict ;
And Dominic's stern habit, splashed with gore
Of heretic, 'neath which the hairshirt pricked ;
And, dotted 'mong the carnal crowd anon,
Were pale-faced nuns, meek, circumspect, and wan.

CXLIX.

When lo ! throughout the kneeling multitude,
From porch to choir, a wavelike motion swept ;
Swift from its sheath as starts a sword long mewed,
Up from their feet the motley concourse stepped,
And, as with one sole sovran will imbued,
In serried ranks yet close and closer crept,
Until a long straight open space they gave
Down the right aisle, and back along the nave.

CL.

Then from afar a long procession came
Of white-robed acolytes silver censers swinging,
And wreathèd flowers, and torches all aflame,
And golden bells melodiously ringing ;
And fair young boys, with faces free from blame,
Tuning their callow throats to such sweet singing,
It seemed to eyes and ears of faith and fear
That Christ and all His cherubim were near.

CLI.

And as they sang, the stately pomp swept on,
Crozier and Cross, inlaid with many a gem,
Taller than those that bore them ; lights that shone
In golden candlesticks with jewelled stem,
And many a bright embroidered gonfalon
Vaunting aloft the new Jerusalem ;
And scintillating reliquaries rare,
And awful Monstrance, whereon none may stare.

CLII.

Last in the solemn train, in cope of gold
And snow-white alb, came venerable eld,
Mitre on head of more than earthly mould,
Led by grave priests, gorgeously chasubled.
And, as they passed, round arch and column old
Incense and organ music rolled and swelled,
Till the long line about the chancel poured,
And then with one acclaim they praised the Lord.

CLIII.

"All ye works of the Lord," they loudly sang,
"Bless ye the Lord, Praise Him for evermore !
Praise Him, ye waves, with your sonorous clang,
Praise Him, ye winds, Praise Him, O sea and shore !
Mountains, and little hills, and clouds that hang
Low o'er the deep, dews, snows, and pinnacles hoar,
Darkness and Light, storms that are silent never,
Bless ye the Lord, Praise Him for ever and ever !

CLIV.

"Bless ye the Lord, fountains and rivers that run,
Huge whales and monsters of the deep profound ;
Praise Him, ye lightnings, moon, and stars, and sun,
Birds of the air, and beasts that graze the ground !
Praise Him for all the wondrous things He has done ;
Praise Him on harps, Praise Him on cymbals of sound !
With sounding trumpet, timbrel, and organ, and chord,
Praise Him ! Let every spirit praise the Lord !"

CLV.

Then on the dense mass sudden silence fell,
Each knee was bent, each reverent skull-cap doffed,
Held was each breath, and, touched by unseen spell,
The organ flutes piped silvery and soft.
Then came the tinkle of a little bell,
And, all heads low, the Host was held aloft ;
While glinted through warm panes day's dying gleam,
And the rapt soul touched Heaven in a dream.

CLVI.

Then once again the organ thundered loud,
Usurping the high edifice with sound,
Whereat with dumb accord the prostrate crowd
Rose, crossed themselves, and to the doorway wound ;
And soon where, late, myriads of knees were bowed
In phalanxed prayer, reigned solitude profound.
The solemn notes waxed faint, then swooned away,
And died along the aisles the light of day.

CLVII.

And now throughout the vague cathedral gloom,
That here and there with lone faint lamps was flecked,
Two forms alone were blackly seen to loom,
A kneeling maiden, and a man erect.
They looked like statues carved at a tomb,
Apeing the quick, with flowing drapery decked,
And praying with fixed lips and stony head
Till the last trump shall sound and rouse the dead.

CLVIII.

But shortly rising, with a beckoning nod
She drew him forward through the weird-like space,
And o'er the hard smooth marble as they trod,
Their feet made fearsome echoes in the place.
Anon she checked him : " Stay you here with God,"
Whispering she said, " I will be back apace."
Then 'mong stone stems he saw her disappear,
Though still her scudding footfall reached his ear.

CLIX.

At length died e'en that sound away ; and then,
He was alone in the tremendous gloom :
Alone with God, far from the help of men,
As anchorite, or child shut in the womb.
Like yawning space the dark roof smote his ken,
The long gaunt aisles seemed avenues of doom,
And, in the distant chancel dimly lit,
Bodiless forms, in shadow, seemed to flit.

CLX.

" Angels and spirits of celestial make !"
Deep from his aching soul aloud he sighed,
" Swoop from your heights, your unseen Heaven forsake,
And now no more my lonely doubts deride.
Sound-sleeping martyrs, in your tombs awake !
Palm-bearing virgins, through the silence glide !
Can you be false who are indeed so fair ?
And if I needs must pray, then hear my prayer !

CLXI.

“ And thou, Olympia’s trust, once mine no less,
Of all the Gods sweetest Divinity !
Mother, and Lady of the mild caress,
Lend me thy face ! oh ! give me eyes to see !
If thou canst hear, why dost thou scorn distress,
Thou before whom demons of darkness flee ?
Let me behold thee once,—once, I entreat !—
E’en as Judea’s mountains felt thy feet ! ”

CLXII.

Not such the prayers to which stern Heaven replies ;
The lips of faith another language speak ;
Celestial visions visit downcast eyes,
And those who find, not arrogantly seek.
No answer came to his presumptuous cries,
Such as, ’tis said, descends on suppliants meek,
But only deeper darkness, and a sense
Of unslaked thirst and yearning impotence.

CLXIII.

At length, again, a solitary tread
Upon the silence trespassed, far and faint ;
Yet well he guessed ’twas hers, than whom the dead
Or never dying vaunt no purer saint.
Nearer, and ever nearer, now it sped,
Until his fancy her fair form could paint
On the dark space, and then the dark space yawned,
And she herself, no fancy, on him dawned.

CLXIV.

“Come with me, now,” she said, in accents low,
And turned straightway, and with such swift command
Led ’mong dense-columned aisles, it seemed as though
Athwart a lonesome wood where huge trunks stand,
Baulking straight steps, together they did go,
He strange, and she familiar in the land,
And, overhead, thick-matted branches made
Day night, and night a more cimmerian shade.

CLXV.

But shortly shone a little light ahead,
Just level with their gaze ; a feeble flame,
Held by a priest in cassock habited
And in mid-doorway seen as in a frame.
He stood as still as stand the pictured dead,
When some deft hand makes death and life the same,
And bids you, doubtful, nearer draw, and seek
If that which gazes so, perchance will speak.

CLXVI.

But ere such doubts by Godfrid could be proved,
Sudden he missed Olympia from his side ;
The tall dark figure in the doorway moved,
And with fine gesture welcome fair implied.
He, by the gracious courtesy behoved
To pass within, advanced with docile stride,
And, entering, straight the other followed him ;
Then the door closed, and all again was dim.

CLXVII.

And where then was Olympia? Ask you where?
She to the awful chancel back had crept,
And, her torn soul surrendered unto prayer,
Lay prone, aye prostrate, even as though she slept.
The flowing tresses of her warm, soft hair,
Dark as the gloom, the cold white marble swept;
She moved not, spake not, sighed not; e'en her breath
Came faint, like one that feebly copes with death.

CLXVIII.

But, rising thence at last, her body first,
She lifted, then her hands, and last her eyes;
And floods of passionate supplication burst
Through lips long sealed, from breast o'ercharged with sighs.
She called on Christ, on Her who bore and nursed,
On every Saint and Seraph in the skies,
And vowed herself to pain, if Heaven would save
From death the dear imperilled soul it gave.

CLXIX.

"Oh, by Thine agony and bloody sweat,
Deliver him, O Lord!" she wildly cried;
"By Thy keen Cross and Passion, save him yet!
Save by Thy crown of thorns and bleeding side!
Why did Gethsemane Thy teardrops wet?
Why wert Thou scourged, why scorned, why crucified?
Why didst Thou die, why gloriously ascend,
Why send the Comforter, be this the end?"

CLXX.

Then in a tempest of hot tears her cries
Were drenched and drowned, her wild words washed away;
Her tears were choked with sobs, sobs swooned to sighs,
Then sighs to silence, and there mute she lay.
Oh, if there be a Heaven beyond the skies,
A Heaven to hear, why was it deaf that day?
For since time's dawn, unto the realms of air
No purer heart e'er breathed a purer prayer.

CLXXI.

"Rise, my dear child," a mild voice gravely said,
"Rise and accept your doom:" whereat she rose.
"In vain is Reason's dew when Faith is dead,
And meek Grace sleeps 'neath Doubt's unmelting snows.
I can no more. The Paraclete hath fled;
Through his parched heart e'en prayer no longer flows.
By Heaven may yet the miracle be wrought;
But human ways are weak, and words are nought."

CLXXII.

Then, lamp in hand, through choir and transept dim
He led them, till he oped a little door,
And, having fatherly blessed her and him,
Closed it, and they beheld his face no more.
The sky was bright with starry cherubim,
Silent, and round them was the city's roar;
And, in their hearts, a human hum and rush,
O'erawed by heavenly sorrow's solemn hush!

CLXXIII.

There motionless they stood, bereft of speech,
As vessels stranded wait for some fresh wave
That yet perhaps will lift them from the beach,
And bear them buoyant o'er the breakers brave.
None came ; and so they lingered, each for each,
Like two lone mourners at an open grave,
Which holds the dead and must be filled with clay,
Yet neither hath the heart to turn away.

CLXXIV.

At length when too oppressive grew the strain,
"Will you not sleep in Milan, dear?" he said ;
Thus seeking with life's needs to fly from pain,
And have their staring sentence respited.
But she, who knew delay was worse than vain,
Raised deprecating hand, and shook her head ;
"No, Godfrid ! Here, our task is ended quite :
Let us retrace our pilgrimage to-night !"

CLXXV.

So once again they fled without delay,
On wings of wind through leagues of dim-seen land,
Night and the stars accompanying their way,
And roar and blackness close on either hand ;
Until the dark drew off, and with the day
They saw the sparkling bay and joyous strand,
White sails, brown oars, huge coils of briny ropes,
And fair proud city throned on regal slopes.

CLXXVI.

And soon the road they came by, which had run
Still by the sea, now smooth as woodland pond,
Saw them once more, love-woven dreams unspun,
Facing farewell. A little way beyond,
A sleek brown mule stood blinking in the sun,
For a long march rudely caparisoned ;
And at its side a gentle mountaineer,
Who to their grief lent neither eye nor ear.

CLXXVII.

“Hear me once more, Olynipia ! Must we part ?
Is Heaven so stern, and can a gentle breast
Inflict, and sooth endure so keen a smart,
When pity’s voice could lull our pain to rest ?
Is there no common Eden of the heart,
Where each fond bosom is a welcome guest ?
No comprehensive Paradise, to hold
All loving souls in one celestial fold ?

CLXXVIII.

“For Love is older far than all the Gods,
And will survive both Gods and men, and be
The sovran ruler still, when Nature nods,
And the scared stars through misty chaos flee.
Take love away, and we are brutish clods,
Blind, spelling out our fate without the key ;
Belated wanderers stumbling through the night,
Cheered by no gleam of home or hope in sight.

CLXXIX.

“ But they who in this cold contentious sphere
Deep in their hearts foster Love’s vestal fire,
Can smile at pain, and all that mortals fear,
And tranquil keep when time and death conspire.
Though fickle winds should vex, they do not veer ;
No threats can daunt them, weary waitings tire ;
Their feet are planted on the clouds ; their eyes,
Glare cannot blind, scan the eternal skies.

CLXXX.

“ This is my creed, and that the Heaven I seek,
Which even here, Olympia ! may be ours,
Unless my lips, or else thine ears be weak,
Or we have outraged the Supernal Powers.
Oh ! but that cannot be. Would Nature wreak
Her wrath on thee, the tenderest of her flowers ?
The sin, if sin there be, is mine, is mine ;
Wrong never was, can pain be ever, thine ?

CLXXXI.

“ Here ’twixt the mountains and the sea I swear,
That I thy Faith will reverence as thy soul,
And as on that bright morning when thy fair,
Entrancing form upon my senses stole,
Still every dewy dawn fresh gifts will bear
Unto Madonna’s shrine, that happy goal
Where our first journey ended, and I fain
Would have this end,—not snapped, as now, in pain ! ”

CLXXXII.

The foam-fringe at their feet was not more white
Than her pale cheek as, downcast, she replied :
“ No, Godfrid ! no ! Farewell, farewell ! You might
Have been my star ; a star once fell by pride ;
But since you furl your wings, and veil your light,
I cling to Mary and Christ crucified.
Leave me, nay leave me, ere it be too late !
Better part here than part at Heaven’s gate ! ”

CLXXXIII.

Thereat he kissed her forehead, she his hand,
And on the mule he mounted her, and then,
Along the road that skirts the devious strand,
Watched her, until she vanished from his ken.
Tears vainly dropped as water upon sand
Or words of grace on hearts of hardened men,
Coursed down her cheeks, while, half her grief divined,
The mountain guide walked sadly mute behind.

CLXXXIV.

But never more as in the simple days
When prayer was all her thought, her heart shall be ;
For she is burdened with the grief that stays,
And by a shadow vexed that will not flee.
Pure, but not spared, she passes from our gaze,
Victim, not vanquisher of Love. And he ?
Once more a traveller o’er land and main :—
Ah ! Life is sad, and scarcely worth the pain !

CLXXXV.

The sun was sinking where the sky-line bounded
The blue and nigh unfurrowed plain of ocean ;
A moment more, was gone, and left confounded
Retreat of day and night's advancing motion.
Then came the moon, rayless, and red, and rounded,
As when sole mistress of our heart's devotion,
And slow began her melancholy march
Up the ascent of Heaven's stupendous arch.

CLXXXVI.

O night upon the waters ! In the hush
Of all except our hearts, which sigh more loud,
To think, despite this momentary flush
Of yearning love, we also are the crowd,
We pray the Invisible to let us rush
Into its arms, and tear away the shroud
That baulks our sense, or likewise hide the veil.
Then comes the dawn, and all again is pale.

CLXXXVII.

Why these brief interviews with things supernal,
Which vex the flesh, then leave it just as carnal ;
Dissatisfy our souls for the diurnal
Foul irksome tasks within their earthly charnel ?
Hear we the music of a real Eternal,
Or nothing but the fancy-wafted far knell,
Such as tossed mariners conceive they hear
When seas and skies grow treacherously clear ?

CLXXXVIII.

O give us spirits' wings, or kindly leave
Us clay alone ! Or pinions, or repose !
More light ! More light ! we cry, and sob, and grieve ;
More light ! More light ! And still it dimmer grows :
Save where, anon, burst flashes to retrieve
Our utter dark and tantalize our woes.
Again we start, again proclaim the dawn.
The curtain drops ; the glimpses are withdrawn.

CLXXXIX.

We are but banners flapping in the wind ;
Cometh a lull, we droop : it blows,—not we :
The tossing spars some wreck hath left behind,
Upon an ever oscillating sea,
To which we owe the motions undefined
A fondly-nurtured self-sufficiency
Deems self-impelled. Behold ! upon its shore,
Wearied, it flings us, and we move no more.

CXC.

The timid tiny dwellers in the brake,
That sing in sunlight and that crouch in storm,
The very mountain mists which silent take
From wind and crag their colour, pathway, form,
Not more than we, who arrogantly make
Ourselves Creation's loftiest type and norm,
Are plastic to the touch of place and hour,
The forces of some strong evolving Power.

CXCI.

If from this like infirmity, the creed
Of universal kinship we may guess,
And so hold fast this little in our need,
We of one parent force endure the stress,
Like or unlike, then am I well agreed
To bear my clog of human littleness,
So I may feel exalted by the leaven
Of the deep lake and the high vault of Heaven.

CXCII.

Ah me ! we grope in language for our thought,
And find it not, or hurt us if we find.
Our dream of immortality is wrought
In the distempered nightmares of the mind,
Which in this sleep, our life, most peril-fraught,
Set us awalking, confident, though blind ;
Till from some height, to which we dared to soar,
Headlong we topple down, and dream no more !

CXCIII.

Such were the thoughts that prowled through Godfrid's mind,
As sleepless on the deck sleep made his own,
He skirted bay, and cape, and hills behind,
And in their hollows villages bestrewn,
Which, dimly seen, were beautiful divined,
And since no sooner just descried than flown,
Held on his heart a fond romantic claim
For ever thence. If life could do the same !

CXCIV.

But soon there crept a tremor overhead ;
The billows shook their white manes, and uprose ;
The sheath'd east more large and crimson spread,
Like a majestic rosebud when it blows.
Up came the sun, impetuous and red :
The moon turned deadly pale, fronting her foes ;
Refused, spite overwhelming odds and ills,
To share her sway, and died behind her hills.

CXCv.

Then from remotest summit to the shore,
And thickly dotted everywhere between,
As sped the vessel frequent more and more,
On bosky slope, in stream-refreshed ravine,
Glistened the marble hamlets ; some that bore
Upon the beach, others in distance seen,
Like maidens dipping white feet i' the spray,
Or dipped, and going up the hills away.

CXCvI.

'Twas here that after wanderings, woe, and wrong,
Such as the world so skilled is to inflict
Upon the sensitive, a child of Song,
Too much perhaps by his own fancy tricked,
Deemed he had found a shelter from the strong,
Tranquil at last, wherein he might depict
The happiness for others he foresaw,
When liberty should be the only law.

CXC VII.

Singer who sang too long before the dawn
By any to be heard save early wakers,
Them who through sleepless windows o'er the lawn
Gazing for day deemed late, are made partakers
Of his new notes so musically drawn :
The poet of the future, whom the breakers
Spared not, and whom his mighty Mother snatched
Back to her bosom from a world ill-matched.

CXC VIII.

'Tis a dull lie-abed, and shrillest notes
Are wasted if rehearsed ere rise of sun.
It listens rather to the dulcet throats
Which warble sweetly when the day is done ;
The pretty songsters whose small trill denotes
That moil is over, indolence begun,
Who, like the drowsy beetle's humming horn,
Are heard in evening twilight, not in morn.

CXC IX.

True poets are precursors, to profess
Faith in the day that hath as yet not burst.
And, if awhile permitted to be less,
With the heart's honey to content their thirst,
Mere voices be in fancy's wilderness,
It is because they ever are at first,
Though witness finally of Light above,
Musical reeds, shook by the wind of Love.

CC.

Swiftly he sped past headland, bay, and frith,
Whose names were once the symbols of the proud,
Until at Leghorn's port he touched, wherewith
The coming resurrection from her shroud
Italy proved ; past Pisa, to its kith
Of old so cruel, now so lowly bowed,
Far swifter even than her hare he sped :
Since Florence called, "Come and be comforted !"

CCI.

For, Florence ! thou art passing well acquainted
With whatso sins and sorrows might deface
Those who or built, or sung, or fought, or painted
For thy renown, and left on thee their trace :
How they aspired, and fell, and rose, and fainted,
As clambering to believed in dwelling-place
Higher e'en than thine, they failed in execution,
But had from thee completest absolution.

CCII.

The fair-faced Raphael, beautiful as child,
Or those his own Madonnas, whose mild eyes
Look down from out their panels, reconciled
To sadness of Divinity's disguise,—
Even he, on whom all Paradise had smiled
'Twixt curtains wide withdrawn, too little wise,
From life he glorified was foully riven
By his own flesh.—Yet, was he not forgiven ?

CCIII.

And he, thy Bard, the Puritan of song,
Who penned the new Apocalypse, wherein
More human truths, than to the old belong,
May be discerned, behind a veil more thin ;
Whose lowliest seat thou keepest now from wrong,
Though in his life thou grudged'st him and his kin
That little, striving now to make amend,—
He too fell off, oblivious of the end.

CCIV.

Comforts it not to know that he who did
By verse exalt beyond all rivalry
Of other women, her whose sovereign lid
Was life's one law to him, not yet on high,
By her was keenly for transgression chid,
When he, admitted to the company
Of disembodied spirits in their bliss,
Felt the sharp words, "I, I am Beatrice!"

CCV.

Proving him human : human, as was he,
That Cyclops soul, the giant of his art,
Whose massive mind and negligently free,
Rude strokes seem unconsummated in part
To microscopic vision ; who to thee
Also belonged, if not in home, in heart,
And over thy divine bard yearned to raise
A monument, sole fitting of his lays !

CCVI.

It might not be. And though his feverish hands
Struck out, in waning years not fading heat,
His own tomb's superstructure, yet it stands
Not o'er his grave : he left it incomplete
When he went outward to the Unseen Lands.
Behind the Duomo's altar pilgrim feet
Seek the unfinished group, and reverent bow.
"Postremum Opus." Who shall finish now?

CCVII.

Beneath it an inscription may you read,
Which telleth that the sculptor left it thus,
Because the marble, in last hour of need,
Betraying flaw, more art made perilous.
Be this as told, 'twere monument indeed,
Fit to surmount e'en his sarcophagus ;
Since do we ever find our poor material,
And at last mostly, fails our sweep etherial.

CCVIII.

But he was as a tree too prodigal,
That bears and hangs among its sheltering leaves
More fruit than e'er can ripen ; some must fall :
Or hot ferocious dam whose womb outheaves
More whelps than she can suckle, but withal
Will not relax from any she conceives
Her savage-loving grip, and fiercely hugs
All to her large but overtasked dug.

CCIX.

Yet how at threat of trouble to thy peace,
That jealous love, strong even unto death,
Would every prized conception swift release,
San Minato e'en yet witnesseth.
And if, less happy here, success might cease
To follow, as in art, his regal breath,
'Twas because Genius never should be goaded
To play a blackleg world whose dice are loaded.

CCX.

Yet in the supreme hour and topmost stage
Of desperate defence, the artist's gaze
Fenced unarmed Beauty from blind battle's rage.
Round Baccio's belfry mattresses to raise,
Lest time should lose its rightful heritage,
And ruin derogate from rival's praise,
Though self forgot, and planning scarp and mole,
Was worthy thee, thou liberal grand soul !

CCXI.

From those dismantled battlements the eye,
Curious, need wander but a little space,
To Bellosguardo, or to spot more nigh,
To note where Galileo's heavenward face,
Companion of the stars, compelled the sky
To yield its secrets : in that ardent chase
Losing the light whereby he made ours more,
No feigned Prometheus, though with fate as sore.

CCXII.

Thou, Florence ! knowest, nor dost blush, that he
Who came to give such witness of the Light,
Human not fabled martyr, when the glee
Of fierce priests smote, flinched in his own despite.
It is enough for weak mortality
To feel, though fires may scorch and engines bite,
That "still It moves." If crushed by rack and rod,
He gave his sight. So, still It moves, thank God !

CCXIII.

Below, within thy city's chiefest square,
Which hence may be descried, another wise
Unsteady martyr's soul went out in glare
And murky accusation to the skies :
Man apostolic ; who, since loth to bear
Protracted torture, to his torturers' lies
Acceded, but less able to abide
Life's burning shame, once more recanting, died.

CCXIV.

Some stars there be, astronomers assert,
So high, their light hath not yet reached our globe.
That for which Galileo suffered hurt,
Was light himself had seen, and so could probe.
Savonarola wore the martyr's shirt,
And gloried in the stake's encaustic robe,
For higher light, the light not yet arrived ;—
Whereof we pray not to be long deprived !

CCXV.

These were thy children, Florence ! all these bowed,
Hard-battling souls, the poet, painter, sage ;
And more than these, whose names and wrestlings crowd
Upon the pen, but must not on the page :
Trusting this much is unto one allowed
Whose lowlier walk their stumbling feet assuage ;
Content if, in this dark perplexing planet, he
May cherish still some faint hopes of Humanity.

CCXVI.

So seemed it unto Godfrid, as, caressed
In the soft arms of Florence' curving walls,
He owned the spell, by none save her possessed,
Which stirs yet soothes the gaze, and never palls ;
Elusive glamour never to be guessed,
Of river, garden, cloister, hills, and halls,
Temples, piazzas, palaces, to slake
The mind's deep thirst or steep the spirit's ache.

CCXVII.

Elsewhere, the present and the past engage
In duel to the death. Behold where Rome,
Spurred by the dotard jealousy of age,
With dullard heel stamps on the cracking loam
Which struggles vainly 'gainst her watchful rage
To let new verdure through. Hence lasting home
We cannot find in her, but turn and groan
For spot whose woes shall not enhance our own.

CCXVIII.

But, deathless Florence ! thou art old, art young,
Sublime, not sad. Thou dost not abdicate
The venerable throne to which the tongue,
The chisel, pencil, pen, of all thy great
And faithful sons, raised thee the world among !
Yet canst thou welcome with a smile sedate
To thy hoar walls and consecrated clime
The gifts and tidings of a newer time.

CCXIX.

Is it vain fancy to conceive that breath
Of those whose living ligaments were loosed
By flexile claws of surreptitious death,
Is with the air they wrought in interfused ?
That in such sense each soul inhabiteth
The selfsame spot which once the body used,
And we, when to their hallowed dust brought close,
Inhale a something makes our own less gross ?

CCXX.

'Twas only thus that Godfrid could account
For new and noble stirrings at his breast,
For intermittent bubblings at a fount
Within his being, hitherto unguessed,
Or, if divined, permitted not to mount ;
By clownish custom stolidly repressed,
Or in the fallows of his native land
Too deeply drained to aid food's fierce demand.

CCXXI.

Still they were intermittent, nothing more,
And came and went as circumstance assigned,
And went and came, and so no channel wore
Wherein the trickling tribute of his mind
Might its more slow but steady influence pour.
They were as fitful, formless, as the wind,
And but at most made passive conscience swell
With hope that action yet was possible.

CCXXII.

Just as robbed Autumn wept herself away,
And the South's bright unweeping winter came
Down from the mountain tops where glittering lay
Her fallen tears congealed, the smouldering flame
Of love that, unextinguished night or day,
Burned in his vestal heart, began to claim
Fresh fuel, and he longed to see once more
Madonna's shrine and Spiaggiascura's shore.

CCXXIII.

Love only escort, yearning his sole guide,
And but one stage his journey, he at last—
For long now seemed the pilgrimage,—descried
The shimmering Eden of his exiled Past.
There, the dell zigzagged up the soft hillside,
There, tripped the streamlet, frolicsome and fast.
There, stood the little chapel, and lo ! there,
Olympia's casement, open to the air.

CCXXIV.

But as he nearer drew, he saw with eyes
That signalled to his heart, and made it beat
With the fast throbs of quick-alarmed surprise,
The temple's portal closed, that used to greet,
With open doors, sunshine, and sea, and skies.
So on its vacant steps he took his seat,
As on that woeful night, and gazing dumb
On the blue breakers, wondered would she come.

CCXXV.

And ever and anon he cast a glance
Up at her window, where was wont to stand
A pot of flowers. Now,—was it only chance?—
No flowers were there. At length, from off the sand,
He saw a bent and withered dame advance
Slow towards the shrine, her spindle in her hand,
Singing, to mind her of the days gone by,
A sweet love-ditty, low and plaintively.

CCXXVI.

As leisurely she came, he leisured rose,
And gazing at her well-remembered face,
Said, "Can you tell me why these doors now close,
And where is she, the guardian of this place?"
"Ah! she is gone; and whither, no one knows.
Spiaggiascura sees no more her face,
Her feet no more! And I have heard them say,
'Twas one like you that drove our dear away.

CCXXVII.

“Sister of Charity they call her now.
She wears black serge around her fair young limbs,
And a white fillet, smoothened o’er her brow,
Hides her once raven hair. Elsewhere her hymns
She chants, and Christ hath got her virgin vow.
But many an eye in Spiaggiascura swims,
Vainly, to have her back. Ah ! well-a-day !
That love and grief should drive our dear away !”

CCXXVIII.

Then on she passed, with feet infirm and slow,
Plying her spindle still, along the shore,
Unto her own pleased ears continuing low
The love-song of her youth that was no more.
But he from her reproach made haste to go,
Lest others came and echoed it, and bore
Straight thence to Milan, making for the pile
Which, ere the mountains, takes the orient’s smile.

CCXXIX.

Empty its vast space now, where once he stood
’Mong myriads packed in prayer ; empty its nave,
Empty the aisles, trunked like a virgin wood,—
Save of a verger, wielding idle stave.
“Pray, tell me where to find a Father good,
Who once the simple folk their sins forgave
That live at Spiaggiascura,” Godfrid said.
“Alas, sir ! he hath been this three months dead !”

CCXXX.

Then seeing sadly, life and death conspired
Against him, with unhoping heart he went
From Milan, and to Florence back retired,
Once more relapsing to that dumb content,
Which, when is nothing more to be desired
This side the grave, sits with its longings bent
Upon the other, and in patience waits
The tardy opening of death's grim-shut gates.

CCXXXI.

Then oftenest his presence might you see,
Ever alone, in corridor and hall,
And mostly there where Venus of the Sea,
Lithe on her white pentelic pedestal,
And pure withal in utter nudity,
Stands, challenging the story of the Fall.
Wait, souls impatient! Art will manumit
The bondsman, Nature, when the times shall fit.

CCXXXII.

On oriental alabaster slab
See marble Cupid, small but perfect, sleep,
As now quite impotent to shoot or stab.
But lo! some poppies tumbled all ahead,
Released in slumber from his infant grab,
With their insidious drowsy syrup steep—
Say, could the artist's choice have been more proper?—
A lately blithe and frolicsome grasshopper.

CCXXXIII.

Before this carven which would Godfrid oft
Stand with a semi-smile within his eyes,
Which, like a sunny gleam that, seen aloft
Only a moment, brightens not the skies,
Descended not to make the mouth more soft,
Then through the open window, listlessly,
As one who marvels but in vain divines,
Gaze at the sunny, silent Apennines.

CCXXXIV.

Withal, with lively concourse, and the gay
Prismatic multitude that daily troops
From broad piazza or from narrower way
Along the quay where mountain Arno stoops
To suit the lowly bridges, would he stray,
Glad with the gladness of the shifting groups,
And when the afternoons grew bright and long,
Mix with the green Cascine's babbling throng.

CCXXXV.

But he was seen there rarely, for he most
Loved in the pale light of the afternoon,
When vespers had been chanted, and the host
Of monks had slipped away with slattern shoon
To cell or sacristy, to stalk like ghost
Through dim-lit aisles where none did importune,
Or in the cloister gardens hard beside
San Marco's shrine or Buonarotti's bride.

CCXXXVI.

With him were fountain, walk, and flower-bed,
And frescoed wall, a little space beyond,
Of open corridor, whereon the dead,
With art ingenuous, reverent, and fond,
Have limned, through gratitude to him who led
Them, his disciples, never to despond,
In colours not like those of modern trick,
But glowing still, the life of Dominic.

CCXXXVII.

Until at times he half began to deem
A rosary would fit his fingers best.
Now that the world appeared a vagrant dream,
Why not the stationary cloister's rest?
Why not, since nothing like itself doth seem,
Doff the poor gauds which death would soon divest,
And since, 'tis said, man nothing but a worm is,
Become a friar, and dispense alkermes?

CCXXXVIII.

Then through the Spezieria's courteous gate
Emerging on the outer world, his eye
And heart felt overburdened with the weight
Of the fair streets, vast hills, and vaster sky,
Where all except himself seemed calm and great.
Then would he lean o'er Ponte Nuovo nigh,
Till did the arbitrary tears annul
A scene for his soft heart too beautiful.

CCXXXIX.

But, with the rising springtide of the year,
There ran a light-heeled rumour through the land,
That Future palpitated-for was here,
And End to be accomplished, long time planned.
In every city pealed the joy-bells clear,
For war to wave anew her smouldering brand.
Men leaped from lethargy, and, as they passed,
Glared in each others' eyes, and looked, "At last!"

CCXL.

And women brought their children in the streets,
And held their nestlings to the martial mirth,
Ashamed no more to offer mother's teats
To those who, once it seemed, would curse their birth.
And maidens sent their other souls, their sweets,
Unwed, but proudly tearful in their dearth,
Thinking, "Rest childless in your patriot graves,
Or freight our wombs with sons no longer slaves!"

CCXLI.

For he, the self-crowned democrat, whose claim
Had herds, condoning violence, confessed,
Unequal heir of a too warlike fame,
Who 'neath the buckler wore a doubting breast,
Had let long-smothered purpose break aflame
Through clouding words, whose meaning still was guessed,
Thinking to vindicate the tinsel yoke,
He durst not lighten, by one noble stroke;

CCXLII.

And thundered for his war-horse. On they came,
He at their head, the galliard plumes of France :
And when the record of her too much shame
Sadly ye read, forget not oft to glance
At one bright page ; for never since the name
Of Brother grew a password, had the lance
Been laid in rest, or war-spurs stuck in steed,
For goal sublimer or for sorer need.

CCXLIII.

Meanwhile, though press and platform might harangue,
Busy with self and turbulent with fears,
He rode him forth, alone, with martial clang,
All the waked centuries singing in his ears,
To drive the bandogs back whose greedy fang
Was fastening deeper with their victim's tears ;
Spontaneous rushed where Italy made moan,
To give her grandeur, or to lose his own.

CCXLIV.

Scared by the mighty name which whilom hunted
Their long gaunt backs, they half relaxed their grip.
She, scrambling to her feet, what spear unblunted
Was left her, seized, and stanchd her bleeding lip ;
Donned armour seeming large for limbs unwonted,
And strode with France to battle, hip to hip ;
While Europe coldly prophesied disaster :
“ See the fair slave making a change of master ! ”

CCXLV.

Not in the thick of fight, but calmly brave,
The diplomatic matador, whose skill
The strife provoked, and could so deftly wave
Freedom's bright-hued offensive flag, until
Brute Austria, goaded, rushed upon the glaive,
That she aggressor seemed, and every will
Sided with Italy's defensive strife,—
Mutely he watched. Grave ! give him back to life !

CCXLVI.

Joyous with carnage, smirched with battle-smoke,
His kingly breast bestarred with gory mud,
Hard on his stirrups, certain of his stroke,
Swimming with sabre-sweep through tides of blood,
Remembering Novara and the yoke
Which crushed his father's soul and curbed the flood
Of his own youthful hopes that now reflowed,
The Soldier-huntsman thunderously rode.

CCXLVII.

From humble homestead in his self-tilled isle,
Sniffing the sanguine tumult from afar,
Promptly he came, that Lion without guile,
That child in heart, that terrible in war !
Through torrent's bed, impervious defile,
Spurning the cumbrous cannon, tumbril, car,
Only with naked blade in naked hand,
Swept with his Redshirts through the echoing land.

CCXLVIII.

For he was haunted by the dying eyes
Of her upon whose breast his own had lain,
And little feet, ne'er felt, that silentwise,
Painless themselves to aggravate his pain,
Curling like leaf its stem no more supplies,
Should from those breasts' sweet shock their birth have ta'en.
These two slept one, within their sandy grave,
To keep him more inexorably brave.

CCXLIX.

And Florence, gentle Florence, good to rule,
Rose from her sunny insolicitude,
Feeling that crafty mildness would befool
Her easy heart to tolerate a brood
Of hireling brows who deem the world a school,
Themselves the ushers. At her altered mood
He fled, their Lord. Without or hiss or groan,
They laughed the discrowned craven from his throne.

CCL.

'Then all the Tuscan youth, like Helen's charmer,
Less for Bellona's than for Beauty's joust
In seeming fitted, donned withal their armour,
And followed in the wake the war-dogs loosed.
And Godfrid felt the passive blood wax warmer
Within his veins, and knew himself traduced
By servile lethargy and despot sorrow,
And sware to join the banners on the morrow.

CCLI.

He had no mother, sister, maid, to leave,
But friendly faces had been bent on him,
And friendly hands stretched out to make him grieve
Less for a past which never could be dim.
His farewells he had ta'en, and, as the eve
On Florence drooped, was hurrying past the brim
Of snow-flushed Arno, in his soldier guise,
When on his arm a hand, and—Christ! those eyes!

CCLII.

The eyes of Olive, still as fair and fond,
The touch of Olive clinging to his side
In mute remembrance of the ancient bond.
Then quick she spoke: "Say, whither do you glide,
With blind gaze fastened on some goal beyond?"
"I go to fight for Italy!" he cried.
"O Olive! come not with that pallid face
To check me, now but started in the race!"

CCLIII.

"Hush! If it e'er could check you, prove it now!
I want your aid. Can Italy not wait?
But choose!" she said. "For death upon his brow
Beleaguering sits, and I am desolate.
Strange faces vex him, and, I know not how—
But, come or go! Why stand I here to prate?
You once were—— Well, I did believe that time
Might quench my love, not leave you less sublime."

CCLIV.

Swiftly together through the streets they sped,
Swift to the chamber mounted where he lay,
With all except the blankness of the dead.
“An English face, dear!” did she softly say,
“Whose name you know.” Sir Gilbert from his bed
Turned a slow glance, and murmured, as a ray
Crept o’er his face of momentary bliss :
“An English face and voice? Thanks, thanks, for this!”

CCLV.

He was so feeble, so usurped by pain,
He could not say, articulately, more ;
But pressure of the hand, and look, made plain
That this new presence made his smart less sore.
Then she explained to Godfrid how the twain
Had come through Umbrian hills from Capuan shore,
Arrived yestreen in Florence’ swarming town,
And he by fever straight been stricken down.

CCLVI.

“The strangeness of the place will aggravate
His mental ache, and multiply his fears ;
The sounds within, without, the hostel-gate,
Are unfamiliar to his home-sick ears.
Can he be saved? Oh! think you ’tis too late?
Yes! he will die!” And rose the woman’s tears,
And clung the woman’s hands. These Godfrid pressed,
And whispered low : “Be calm, and hope the best!”

CCLVII.

And then he set himself, as best he might,
With hands not quite so gentle as his heart,
Unskilled indeed, and all inapposite
For this new task, to play the nurse's part ;
Urging meanwhile the unpaid debt of night
And travel's weariness, with specious art,
To her, he said, who must from slumber snatch
Strength to relieve him in to-morrow's watch.

CCLVIII.

At last, reluctant, on a couch hard-by,
Still robed, she lay, and soon was deadfly sleeping :
While darker waned the light in Gilbert's eye,
And o'er his temples were the death-dews creeping.
The fitful night-gusts from a swooping sky
And hills of melancholy mist came sweeping ;
Till Godfrid's ears, excited, thought to find
The crash of battle flying on the wind.

CCLIX.

And then as darkness deepened, and the storm
Howled for the moon that came not, and the night
Scowled that she tarried, o'er the fevered form
Came writhing pangs and agonies to fright,
Which give to dying limbs a strength enorm ;
The which with gentle words but nervous might
Strove Godfrid to assuage, beset with fear
Lest yon sound sleeper should awake and hear.

CCLX.

Thank Heaven that utter weariness and woe
Kept that last trouble from her! Still she slept,
As tossing tortures had their ebb and flow.
And once the sufferer with a smile that crept
Faintly around the lips, with gesture slow,
And eyes that but for weakness would have wept,
Drew Godfrid down to give a strange caress,
By coming doom unmanned to tenderness.

CCLXI.

"Thanks, more than brother! But I die, to-night!"
He breathed, and on the pillow weakly sank.
Colder the feet, the lips more pinched and white,
Clammier the hands, more moist the hair and lank.
Crept through the casement omens of the light
Of lagging dawn, but cloud-distressed and dank.
Then woke the fair flushed sleeper from repose,
Blaming her eyes that they could ever close.

CCLXII.

Still he was there, and through the doubtful morn,
Through struggling noon, once more defended eve,
Into another night was bravely borne
By hard-pressed dogged life that would not leave
The centre of its citadel, though shorn
Of hope that outward succour would relieve;
Until it seemed that death, of late so eager,
Fell back from lines 'twas useless to beleaguer.

CCLXIII.

Five days and nights they nursed him, Godfrid ne'er
Closing his eyes, and Gilbert scarcely more ;
Who, fretful, could not for an instant bear
To miss his form or footstep from the floor ;
Claiming attention more from him than her,
Wishful perchance to screen the pain he bore
From her the weaker, and because man's strong
Unwearied arms make hope appear more long.

CCLXIV.

A week, a puzzling, shapeless week, had gone,
When sunshine seemed to venture in the room,
Not through the windows only, but upon
The learn'd brows so long enwrapt in gloom ;
And, the eighth morning, when they came to con
That pale sunk face, the very leech from whom
Comfort came rarest, whispered low at length,
“ He yet may live ; 'tis an affair of strength ! ”

CCLXV.

His whims waxed fewer, and his gaze less wild.
At last came sleep ; true, but a timid sleep,
Like wounded friend but lately reconciled,
Whom thoughts of past estrangement somewhat keep
Embarrassed still, withal a slumber mild,
Well-wishing, kindly, if nor long nor deep ;
Under whose covering influence might faint life
Repair the losses of its recent strife.

CCLXVI.

As the sick-chamber felt returning dawn
Of hope deemed set for aye, and tender heed
Might from the bedside partly be withdrawn,
The gaze of her, which lately could but feed
On its vicissitudes, seemed now to fawn
Less upon it, than him Fate sent in need,
With look of thankful wonder in her eyes,
Blent with affection, deeper for disguise.

CCLXVII.

As dawn on night, as night on evening crept,
Strength summoned stealthy courage to invade
The slowly cooling channels lately swept
By subtle fever's enervating raid.
And when, the eleventh morn, the doctors stepped,
Wonted, across the threshold, and surveyed
The form that had so obstinately braved
The onset of close death, they murmured, "Saved!"

CCLXVIII.

Then sleep, so generous still, if sensitive,
And anxious now to make a full amend
For absence long, approaches coy and stiff,
Seeming as though it never could expend
The kept-back love it long had yearned to give,
Nor prove itself enough the true old friend
Of former nights, found even night too brief
Wherein to bring the sufferer relief.

CCLXIX.

One morn, the fourth from that on which the words
Of promised life had life still more promoted,
From soundest sleep he woke. Without, the birds,
Many, and musical, and swollen-throated,
Lustily carolled. Voices of the herds,
From slopes unseen, into the city floated ;
With sunshine-shadow blended, and the sense
Of life come back, and Spring's young influence.

CCLXX.

Yes ! Spring had, jocund, danced adown the hills,
Filling the valleys with her footsteps fair,
And beckoning to the leaping mountain rills
Her swifter flight to follow, if they dare.
The dainty crocus and bluff daffodils
Pushed through the sod to drink the honeyed air.
The light lark into soaring treble burst,
To tell to Heaven what Earth had learned the first.

CCLXXI.

"Godfrid !" he murmured. But no answer came.
"Poor fellow ! he is wearied, and at last
Seeks the repose he has such right to claim,
Now that my peril, thanks to him, is passed.
He felt within so steady glow the flame
Of life late flickering, and so longed to cast
One look without, he slowly, stiffly, stepped
From his lone couch, and to the window crept.

CCLXXII.

He opened. Just below, the city lay,
The marble shining city ; but, between,
Waved feathery trees in fresh-assumed array
Of many-shaded but harmonious green.
Seemed air, and sky, and mountains far away,
To swim and sparkle in a perfumed sheen,
And, nearer coming, to salute his brow,
And bid him own he ne'er had lived till now.

CCLXXIII.

Roses, o'erburthened with their weight of flowers,
And drooping 'neath their own too luscious scent,
Hung over garden walls, and to young bowers
Transformed hoar gate and ruined battlement.
The nightingales through all the noonday hours
Sang, not for sorrow, but for heart's content ;
Nor round the circuit of the city fair,
But over penthoused street and broad bright square.

CCLXXIV.

It seemed as though the universe and he
Together had revived, and now his heart,
Hereto in sooth not over quick to see
The year's distinct emotions, had a part
In her new vernal geniality.
But unto him was solitude a smart :
He could not look, alone ; 'twas not his fate
To find in Nature friend and intimate.

CCLXXV.

So thence he tottered, weak, across the floor,
To an adjoining chamber. Nought could be
More sweetly sunny or deserted more.
From world without, came hummings of the bee,
And liquid linnet trills. By open door,
Into another room he passed, to see
Godfrid on couch, asleep, with weary limb,
And Olive, nigh, intently watching him !

CCLXXVI.

Down her fixed face, as alabaster pale,
The tears were trickling steadily and slow,
As stream those currents which nor flood nor fail,
Because from deep enduring source they flow.
He stood transfixed, reading the pictured tale,
And then completing it by his own woe :
Incarnate revelation, come at last,
Explaining each fresh puzzle of the past.

CCLXXVII.

All—all,—in that mute telltale group he saw :
The bondage of a breast he once had deemed
Must love like his into love's orbit draw ;
The cold consents which more like sufferance seemed
Than blood's response ; obedience chilled by awe,
Not warmed by tenderness ; the tears that gleamed
Ofter in eye than smile round lip or brow ;—
In these,—in more,—he stood instructed now.

CCLXXVIII.

For in that concentrated gaze he read
Not love alone, but love's stern hopelessness,
Whose first, whose last indulgence was to shed
Thus openly the tears 'twould else repress,
Before that blameless, tranquil-sleeping head,
Unconscious cause of her,—of his distress.
He could not salve his woe with sense of wrong,
Nor anguish learn from vengeance to be strong.

CCLXXIX.

He turned away to go, as men will turn
From grief they cannot grapple with, and sought
Soft to retire, that so she might not learn
The ruin in his heart her heart had wrought,
And, unaccused, for other's heart might yearn.
But gently though he moved, the sound she caught,
And, keen as guilt for every step that stirs,
Read in his face all he had read in hers.

CCLXXX.

No word by him or her was uttered then,
Or ever, of the truth, now both well knew,
And while she silently eschewed his ken,
He mute into his hollow woe withdrew.
But from that hour she sickened straight ; and when
Godfrid awoke refreshed with slumber's dew,
And came with hearty mien to greet them both,
He found her sunk in strange mysterious sloth.

CCLXXXI.

At first he thought 'twas nature's self, who, wise,
Was but unstringing chords, long overstrained,
And, when he marked no dread in Gilbert's eyes,
Deemed every torpid moment, moment gained.
But when she sleepless lay in sleepy guise,
And hour by hour the pale-pink life-tints waned
From cheeks but late incarnadined with youth,
Fear gathered in his heart, foreboding ruth.

CCLXXXII.

And when the leeches, come to take farewell
Of Gilbert, scanned her face and touched her hand,
She said she needed not the medicined spell,
Nor had she any ache they understand.
Nor could they, sooth, her lethargy dispel,
Or say what foe, of all the dismal band,
Was lurking in her blood, but sought to learn,
By questioning words, what skill could not discern.

CCLXXXIII.

And when they Godfrid asked if any woe,
Of old or recent canker, vexed her heart,
With stare for stare he answered, "Who shall know?"
Whereat they moved away and talked apart,
And coming back, "Believe us, that is so.
Hers is a malady beyond our art.
We know not whether she will die or live,
For we have neither death nor life to give:"

CCLXXXIV.

And so departed. Then she, like a light
That burns dim, dimmer, towards the break of day,
Within an alabaster vase at night,
As Gilbert waxed in strength, so waned away,
Then, without warning flicker, went out quite,
And, all her sorrows silenced, smiling lay.
She looked so bland, so griefless, on her bier,
You would have thought she had been happy here.

CCLXXXV.

There is no name for that of which she died,
Unless we call it weariness of heart,
Which still can slay, however men deride
Its potency, and 'gainst it vaunt their art.
But she hath now the peace for which she sighed,
And ne'er again will know or want or smart.
She never more will draw uneasy breath,
For she hath wed the faithful bridegroom, Death.

CCLXXXVI.

There is a peaceful cemetery stands
Where the Fair City's walls once cast their shade,
Filled with the dead beloved of other lands;
And One sleeps there whose memory will not fade.
Their dreamless bed is made by stranger hands,
And in strange earth their limbs forlorn are laid.
No English flowers bloom there, but tapereth high
The solemn cypress, pointing to the sky.

CCLXXXVII.

There, 'mong the restful, Olive has her rest,
Borne thither from the restless, both by him
She loved, and him she should have loved, the best.
No pompous dirge was sung, no funeral hymn
Vexed the deep silence of her shut-up breast :
Only a few grave words, and tears that swim
In manly eyes when the cold covering earth
Takes all we had, and leaves us to our dearth.

CCLXXXVIII.

But when the sycophants of death had flown,
Still 'mong the white memorials of life's fate,
Gilbert and Godfrid, lingering, grieved alone.
Hard-by, they heard through Pinti's buzzing gate
The rolling wheels of war, and trumpets blown
By those who, not less eager because late,
Made for the front of Freedom's thickening lines
Through the choked passes of the Apennines.

CCLXXXIX.

And Godfrid's soul, like war-horse when it hears
The long loud bugles blow, pricked at the sound.
"Now must I go ! This is no time for tears.
Farewell ! I speed me to yet holier ground.
I hear the summons of the harked-for years ;
At last, at last, a godlike Cause is found.
Who tends the dead, when lo ! twixt Alp and wave,
A buried Nation bursteth from its grave ?"

CCXC.

And as he spake, the fire that filled his eye
Was flashed from Gilbert's with reflected ray,
Who, as at grief enraged, thus made reply :
"Let me go, too. Now wherefore should I stay ?
Life still keeps something, so it be to die
In the hot hour of liberating fray.
What is 't to me for what I fight or whom,
So you but find me sword, and foe, and tomb !"

CCXCI.

So where the graves are quietest she lieth,
She who was so unfortunate, though fair.
While to the rest full many a footstep hieth,
To her hushed mound none ever doth repair.
But fleecy cloud, and sunny breeze that flieth,
Seem to have made it their peculiar care.
As for the twain, they vanished in the rattle
Of jolting tumbrils and the joy of battle.

END OF ACT II.

ACT III.

ACT III.

PROTAGONISTS :

LOVE—RELIGION—COUNTRY.

PLACE :

CAPRI—MENTANA.

TIME :

OCTOBER—NOVEMBER 1867.

ACT III.

I.

THE laggard Child of Liberty and Light,
Long travailled by the centuries, now was born :
She had put off the lethargy of night,
And like a Goddess stood, facing the morn.
Minerva's self had not more full-grown might
At her swift birth ;—a thing no more to scorn.
A turret-crown crested her forehead clear ;
Calm was her front, and in her hand a spear.

II.

The Long-expected of the Nations stood
A-tiptoe on the mountains ; Morning sang
For heart of joy, and o'er the crisp blue flood
That laves soft shores, a jubilant pæan rang.
There was a stir sent through the old world's blood,
And long-hushed lyres lent dithyrambic clang.
Hope was rethroned upon her ancient seat,
And pining peoples came and kissed her feet.

III.

The dream of poets throbbing in their graves ;
The creed by patriot martyrs, as they smiled,
Clutched like a cross, when custom's ready slaves
Around their flesh the flaming faggots piled :
Dawn seen in durance dim of midnight caves
By sightless eyes of souls waxed weird and wild ;—
All now had burgeoned, and from sea to sea,
From shore to summit, Italy was free !

IV.

No more 'midst dank lagunes and oozing walls,
Echoing to silence, Venice crouched and wept ;
A glow was on her waters ; to her halls
The lustrous glamour of gay eld had crept.
Last of the dull Barbarian's dainty thralls
To feel her limbs, up to her feet she leapt,
Clasping her Lombard brother by the hand,
While throbs of welcome trembled through the land.

v.

For, ere her woes had moved the heart of ruth,
Day on her lone divided kindred broke.
The bright Parthenope renewed her youth,
And lithe Etruria slipped the tyrant's yoke.
Umbria shook off the gnawing church-wolf's tooth,
And, happy once again, Campania woke ;
And round rent Savoy's Cross as hot they pressed,
Italia clasped her children to her breast.

VI.

All—all,—save one ! Rome still in fetters lay,
Writhing beneath the hierarch's heavy heel ;
The eldest-born of that renowned array,
From franchised kith cut off by warding steel.
For fitful Gaul, whose horns were first to bray
Salvation o'er the hill-tops, feebly leal
To its own dream, from such high quests had ceased,
Playing scorned gaoler to a trembling priest !

VII.

And all the world looked on with gaze of stone,
Cold or approving ; for the days were ill.
Some said the Altar propped the sceptic Throne,
And, twin at birth, they must be coupled still ;
Some, that no more Christ's Godhead could be shown,
Save Peter's sword chastised the infidel ;
And some, that Italy e'en now was blest
Sooth overmuch, and Europe wanted rest.

VIII.

So in the gyves by tonsured tyrants wrought,
Rome still lay languishing, nor spake for woe,
But only with pale eyes her kin besought
To watch the hour to smite her keeper low.
Therefore they waited ; for was worse than nought
Their own reproachful freedom, while the blow
Unstruck remained, and in the obscene dust
Their mother's shame fed Gaul's vainglorious lust.

IX.

So every eye and heart were turned to Rome,
And hands were sworn to vengeance. Maidens thrust
Their lovers from them, spurning peaceful home
While blades still crouched in scabbards, lolled in rust.
Round their brown limbs as plashed the purple must,
Or with the share they ploughed the wavy loam,
All sang of Rome : " Rome, Rome shall yet be ours !
Sleep, Tyrants, sleep ! we count the ripening hours."

X.

The sickle's arm caressed the lissom corn,
To strains that throbbed of Rome ; the blade which pruned
The shading elm or lopped the straggling thorn,
At each brave stroke to songs of Rome was tuned.
The shepherd boy upon the hills forlorn,
When his tired flock to sweet siesta swooned,
On his rude reed piped plaintively of Rome,
And, tiny patriot, heaved a sigh for home.

XI.

The winds that shrilled through each adventurous shroud
That skimmed the Tyrrhene sea, rang loud of Rome ;
To songs of Rome were timed the arms that bowed
O'er Hadria's oar or clave Liguria's foam.
The quarry's hollow bosom echoed loud
The self-same notes ; and where the chamois clomb
In fancied fastness, 'twas that ditty sweet,—
Sweet if yet sad,—that scared its flying feet.

XII.

Round the warm hearth or under chilly stars
Men gathered, 'mong themselves discoursing low ;
And as the stalwart grimly stroked their scars,
Bold striplings murmured, "We, too, sure shall go ?"
Now every brawny babe was gat of Mars,
And suckled by a she-wolf ; bred to grow
To god-like heights, by heavenly blood impelled,
And rear a Rome diviner than of eld.

XIII.

But they who ruled the land since death had dragged
Down to its greedy cave the daring mind
That staked, to swell, its fortunes, sate as gagged,
And in the swathes of policy confined.
With halting gait the would-be leaders lagged
Behind the led, and feebly watched the wind,
Nursing a craven hope that Fortune's wheel
Would drop the prize they feared to snatch by steel.

XIV.

So to the rocky home of him who still
Bore Aspromonte's bullet in his flesh,
Men's hopes were strained, that soon his chafing will
Would whet the blade and lift the flag afresh ;
That he, their Cincinnatus, tied to till
Idly the niggard soil, would rend the mesh
The alien round him wove, and, long-implored,
Beat out at last his ploughshare to a sword.

XV.

There is an isle, kissed by a smiling sea,
Where all sweet confluent meet : a thing of heaven,
A spent aërolite, that well may be
The missing sister of the starry Seven.
Celestial beauty nestles at its knee,
And in its lap is nought of earthly leaven.
'Tis girt and crowned with loveliness ; its year,
Eternal summer ; winter comes not near.

XVI.

'Tis small, as things of beauty oft-times are,
And in a morning round it you may row,
Nor need a tedious haste your bark debar
From gliding inwards where the ripples flow
Into strange grotts whose roofs are azure spar,
Whose pavements liquid silver. Mild winds blow
Around your prow, and at your keel the foam,
Leaping and laughing, freshly wafts you home.

XVII.

They call the island Capri ;—with a name
Dulling an airy dream, just as the soul
Is clogged with body palpable ;—and Fame
Hath longwhile winged the word from pole to pole.
Its human story is a tale of shame,
Of all unnatural lusts a gory scroll,
Record of what, when pomp and power agree,
Man once hath been, and man again may be.

XVIII.

Terrace and slope from shore to summit show
Of all rich climes the glad-surrendered spoil.
Here the bright olive's phantom branches glow,
There the plump fig sucks sweetness from the soil.
'Mid odorous flowers that through the Zodiac blow,
Returning tenfold to man's leisured toil,
Hesperia's fruit hangs golden. High in air,
The vine runs riot, spurning human care.

XIX.

And flowers of every hue and breath abound,
Charming the sense ; the burning cactus glows,
Like daisies elsewhere dappling all the ground,
And in each cleft the berried myrtle blows.
The playful lizard glides and darts around,
The elfn fireflies flicker o'er the rows
Of ripened grain. Alien to pain and wrong,
Men fill the days with dance, the nights with song.

XX.

Upon a beetling cliff, eyeing the flood,
Stood one in prime of years ; but there was that
In his grave gaze which told of storms withstood,
And on his brow a lofty patience sate.
His was the tranquil mien of one who would
Wrestle with fate and lay obstruction flat,
But lets the meaner ills of life go by,
Bears small shafts dumb, nor gives lewd tongues the lie.

XXI.

His cheek was bronzed by ray, and wind, and wave ;
His careless dress bespake a sunny land ;
But his blue eye and chestnut tresses gave
Unerring tokens of a northern strand :
That strand which still begets the fair and brave,
Though there all service brave hath long been banned,
And supple Tribunes, fumbling in a hoard
Of craven gains, buy off each threatening sword.

XXII.

With Italy's flowing fortunes Godfrid's sword,
By victory's wave upborne, had ridden still :
Fleshed on that day when first the Austrian horde
Was swept from Lombard plain, nor sheathed until
The unclean Bourbon monster lay and roared,
Like old Typhœus crushed 'neath Ischia's hill,
And from Romagna's gangrened flesh and worn
Amortized limbs, were priest-clinched shackles torn.

XXIII.

Then came that chilling pause, when though from peak
Of Apennine and Alp to dimpling wave,
The glow of Freedom mantled o'er the cheek
Of the fair land, in shadow of the grave .
Rome grovelled mute, and Venice, pale and weak,
Sobbed 'neath her Teuton ravisher,—lovely slave,
Who, reared at Liberty's maternal knee,
Yearned for the pure embraces of the free.

XXIV.

Even to her, deliverance came at last,
Yet not in the sweet guise brave men had dreamed.
Though Italy aside the scabbard cast,
Upon her blade no ray of victory gleamed.
But 'mong the realms by force and fraud amassed,
While rival robbers each from other schemed
To filch a province for his own domains,
Then Venice seized the hour, and slipped her chains.

XXV.

Not on Custozza's baleful field, but where
Trent cleaves Tyrolean Alp, had Godfrid fought,
And, when the sword was sheathed, within this fair
Famed isle, at once a home and watch-tower sought,
Waiting for day to dawn on Rome's despair;
And hither oft would come, and, steeped in thought,
Silently watch from Capri's sunny brow
The soft sea lave its feet, even as now.

XXVI.

Here, too, when drooped awhile the wind of war,
Which, blowing up from Freedom's freshening wave,
Had thinned the clouds that dimmed Italia's star,
Returning to its sheath reluctant glaive,
Had Gilbert safe retired, and watched afar
The day which yet should dawn for priest and slave,
And fill the lungs which now drew sleepy breath
With the awakening watchword, "Rome or Death!"

XXVII.

When first the breeze of battle filled his ears,
He was as one who, reckless of dismay,
Seeks but to reach the bristling hedge of spears,
And on their points to fling his life away.
But wayward death, which follows him that fears,
Fears him that follows, still refused to slay
One who pursued its steps from field to field,
And found in scorn of life life's surest shield.

XXVIII.

But as in vain he fought for his own doom,
Finding but glory where he sought for rest,
The Cause espoused in hope 'twould bear a tomb,
'Gan for its own great sake to wed his breast.
There, once ensconced, it drove out idle gloom,
Bade sluttish sorrow do male will's behest,
Aired the close chambers of his grief-locked brain,
And through his wants made ordered purpose reign.

XXIX.

Then as the loitering demons of distress
Skulked 'fore its wand, his mind thus purified
'Gan to discern the larger from the less,
And scan existence on its nobler side.
The vulgar scales of wealth, the silken stress
Of pompous life, the crowns of pasteboard pride,
With which false honour girds the gilded brow,
All he had known and shared, he blushed for now.

XXX.

Long cramped and famished by the tethering chain
Convention fastens on the homely mind,
When once let loose upon more broad domain,
Nor in a narrow island plot confined,
His nature widened with life's widening plain,
And thought's expanding arms embraced mankind.
He pined no more for puny hearth of home,
But lived for Italy, would die for Rome.

XXXI.

The wealth he had inherited, not won,
Which most who win or herit, swinish spend
Luxuriously lolling in the sun,
Till their plethoric wallowing comes to end,
Seen with his opened eyes, belonged to none,
Not e'en to him, except as Freedom's friend,
A passing trust which Heaven would judge at last,
Bequeathed to endless futures by the past.

XXXII.

Something of this from Godfrid had he learned,
Who, earlier versed in wisdom's generous lore,
When once he found her counsels were not spurned,
Urged them on Gilbert ever more and more.
But many the bark that never has returned
Unto the hands that pushed it from the shore ;
And, Gilbert once inspired by Godfrid's mind,
The pupil soon the mentor left behind.

XXXIII.

Still, as of old, by reason's mid-day rays
His steps correcting, steadfast 'gainst extremes,
Godfrid had progress craved through ordered ways,
Nor leagued with those who now through waking dreams,
Because in midmost night the first to raise
The eyes of desperate hope to Freedom's beams,
Deemed that they saw the dawn of perfect day,
And suns of righteousness must shine for aye.

XXXIV.

The frantic watchwords which, when blown aloud,
Have ofttimes fooled the good, but ne'er the wise,
Of "Rulers, pass your sceptres to the crowd!"
He could not but distrust, indeed despise.
Nor because he himself had disallowed
The altar's claim to bind or bow his eyes,
Joined he with those who, reckless of the end,
Treat as his direst foe man's dearest friend.

XXXV.

But few there be who in a world unfair,
Unbalanced, still keep equitable mind.
And Gilbert, giddy with the bracing air
Of freedom, looked before him nor behind.
Of its swift treacherous tempests unaware,
Nor his sails reefing with the rising wind,
The mad gusts circling 'mong his un-taut shrouds,
Unpoised, he drifted with the drifting clouds.

XXXVI.

In the dead weights hoar wisdom would affix
Young hope to steady in its daring flight,
He could but see stale statecraft's envious tricks,
Lest liberty should soar to heavenly height.
Like one who newly to the tourney pricks,
And gallops past his mark, and wastes his might,
He fain had home with alien king o'erthrown,
And razed the altar, having wrecked the throne.

XXXVII.

Thus each crude enterprise and yeasty vow,
That borrowed freedom's flag, had Gilbert shared,
Though Godfrid stood apart with blaming brow,
Nor moved till clear the Royal trumpets blared.
And as it had been hitherto, so now.
The self-made tracks which tortuous rashness dared,
Still pushing on towards Rome, while one essayed,
One by the king's highway the journey made.

XXXVIII.

But never 'twixt the twain came grudge or wrath
To flaw the friendship sanctioned by the grave ;
And Godfrid, leaning on the mossy cloth
Which draped the wall that overlooks the wave,
Far down soft-fretting into pearly froth,
Or lithely crinkling into gravelly cave,
Was joined by Gilbert, who had left his skiff
Tethered below, and climbed the staircased cliff.

XXXIX.

Awhile they both were silent ; side by side,
Gazing across the scarcely-rippling bay
To the low shore where, curving deep and wide,
Then up the hills half climbing, Naples lay.
Or, did one speak, the other scarce replied ;
For only triflers spoil the summer-day
With purposeless quick babble, vexing ears
That fain would list to sounds which silence hears.

XL.

But when this silence seemed to reach its noon,
Gilbert began, with slowly earnest tone,
To speak of freshly burgeoned hopes, which soon
Would into full luxuriance be grown,
That foully-ravished Rome no more should croon
Upon her desolate hearth, but vengeful grown,
And driving tonsured Tarquins from her door,
Renew the conquering Commonwealth of yore.

XLI.

But Godfrid listened to the ardent tale,
Unmoved nor wondering. Only when 'twas done,
Fixing his gaze on a white-bosomed sail,
Far off, which, lightly heaving in the sun,
Seemed its own guide, own counsel, and own gale,
And in the track of its own hopes to run,
With unpremeditated words which take
Shape from past meditation, thuswise spake :

XLII.

“You trust me still, and you do well to trust ;
For I who yet must blame, shall not betray.
Brighten your blade then ! Mine, alas ! must rust.
Sage peace is sadder than insanest fray.
Yet once more hear me, Gilbert ! and be just.
Is Aspromonte’s lesson thrown away ?
Is the throne false ? The nation’s hunger dulled ?
Or Turin’s senate’s solemn vote annulled ?

XLIII.

“By all the lineal titles of the past,
By this to-day’s inheritance, by ties
Already future-sanctioned, that shall last,
Rome will be gathered to Italian skies.
Wait ! they but stumble who would step too fast.
Foresight and fate, the foolish and the wise,
Alike push on the hour that snaps the yoke.
Watch we the moving hands, and bide the stroke !

XLIV.

“Beware that wasteful appetite which rends
The too high bough, to pluck the yet crude fruit,
That would itself weigh down the bough it bends,
If left to swell and ripen from the root.
Ah ! haste and harvest never yet were friends ;
And in man’s brain but rioteth the brute,
When straight he rusheth at each sight and sound,
With base-lowered front and eyes that skim the ground.

XLV.

“ Too fast ! Too far ! I cannot go with you.
The old traditions may be dust and draff,
And they who passed them on, the wise, the few,
Have from the crowd a thankless epitaph.
But is your new evangel therefore true ?
Grant that the ears be mildewed, will the chaff
Make good the grain, turning the white but brown ?
Or do the skies rain manna always down ?

XLVI.

“ Enough to purge this land of alien lords,
And weld its many sceptres into one ;
And thanks to smiling Heaven and smiting swords,
The patient, piecemeal task is well-nigh done.
I see the straining of the worn-out cords,
By potent hands in other ages spun,
Potent no more, and know that Rome will be
The hearth, that was the crib, of Italy.

XLVII.

“ But though from the Tiara we must strike
One storey of the too proud edifice,
Need we assail the crook to wrench the pike ?
Ah ! Gilbert ! Gilbert ! We should do amiss.
’Ware how you weaken force and faith alike !
Reason and reverence first must learn to kiss.
The centuried growth it is which props the walls.
Tear down the ivy, and the ruin falls.”

XLVIII.

Gilbert replied not ; for the closing words,
Like melancholy music, made him mute.
Mute too was all, save where the slow sea-birds
Plained, or behind them dropped some o'er-ripe fruit,
Or, in far clefts, bleated the bearded herds.
At length, with scarce farewell and hasty foot,
He turned him from the spot, and, to the shore
Descending,—Godfrid stood alone once more.

XLIX.

Absorbed in luscious idleness he seemed,
Watching the languid ripples crawl to land,
As one whose bliss was deepest when he dreamed,
And who earth's beauty rather felt than scanned.
Yet oftentimes the souls all sailless deemed
By trivial gaze, with inward fires are fanned,
And neither baulked by wave nor helped by wind,
Cleave life's rough surf, when gay barks lag behind.

L.

But brief his re-found solitude ; for soon,
Among the vines which clustered thick behind,
There came a maid, singing a mountain tune.
And, as she moved, vagrant as summer wind,
The bright green leaves into a long festoon
She wove, and round her crimson kirtle twined.
Crimson her bodice, white her brimming vest,
And white the kerchief folded o'er her breast.

LI.

Her body was of stalwart make ; her limbs
Vaunted the strain of that Olympian line,
Reared upon earth, as sung in deathless hymns,
When mortal mould was filled with juice divine.
The mist of time the glowing story dims,
But bear me witness, ye Immortal Nine !
That Jove's stout stock yet lingers in the isle,
And Venus still in daughters fair doth smile.

LII.

Her skin was lustrous as the ripening grape,
And, like the grape's, the sanguine flesh beamed through ;
Her eyes could match the olive's dainty shape,
And far outshone its darkly-burnished hue.
Twisted in coils above the massive nape,
Her classic hair grand memories might renew,
Back from her brow, free from fantastic wiles,
Rippling like ocean, when dark ocean smiles.

LIII.

She seemed a bright embodiment of one
Of those too marble visions that were lent
To Grecian eyes ere Art's brief race was run,
Wherein grace, strength, and beauty all are blent :
A statue stirred to motion ; by the sun
Pulsating made for mortal ravishment ;
A dream with flesh endued ; a chiselled thought,
Catching warm being from the hand that wrought.

LIV.

She was not learn'd in that bookish lore
Which men call knowledge ; but her arms could ply
In the stiff surge withal a valorous oar,
And quick hands make the flashing shuttle fly.
It was her fingers wove the dress she wore,
What time the night held more than half the sky ;
And when the days were long, from dawn to close
Still would she climb, nor ever crave repose.

LV.

And yet she was a woman,—gently framed
For loving purposes. The murderous snare
She never set, nor barrel deadly-aimed
At bird or beast consented she to bear.
E'en in the fishers' net her hands disclaimed
All helpful service ; but when none were there,
Oft she disported 'mong the timorous tribe,
With fearless breast ploughing the brine aside.

LVI.

The womb that bore her, like a tree with fruit
Too rich and rare, had perished with her birth ;
And, ere she lisped, her father's lips grew mute
For aye, and she was left alone on earth.
No, not alone ; for every native lute
Was tuned to glad her little ears with mirth ;
And now along the mainland, many a mile,
Men sang the lovely Orphan of the Isle.

LVII.

She played on no rare instrument or rude,
Her homely fingers knew no dainty trick ;
But oh ! her voice with cunning was imbued
To soothe the soul or cheat the spirit sick.
Hear her, e'en now, in fancied solitude,
As slow she moves among the vineyard thick,
Singing a song of Liberty, to pierce
Fate's dullard ears, and soften tyrants fierce !

LVIII.

"Miriam !" he called. But ere the word was blown
Athwart the leafy distance to her ear,
The strain he thought had ceased, again had grown
To silvery volume, ringing far and near.
Enthralled, he listened to each swelling tone,
Each falling note, till both died, cadenced clear,
On the blue air ; then "Miriam !" called once more.
"I come," she cried, and straight towards him bore.

LIX.

In either hand a bunch of grapes she held :
The left were garnet, opal were the right ;
Clustering and tapering, full-veined, sunshine-swelled,
They would have filled Iacchus with delight ;
One of whose Charities of early eld
She seemed, with every genial grace bedight ;
That gentle Triad who the innocent earth
Girdled with music, modesty, and mirth.

LX.

And as she came anear, the juicy bells
She merrily held and dangled in his face.
“Eat, eat of these ; for old tradition tells
That they the sombre soul’s worst clouds will chase ;”
Then with that frank simplicity which dwells
Alone with unsophisticated grace,
Archly went on, “Accept the simple cheer ;
My tithe to him who preaches all the year.”

LXI.

“Thanks for my tithe, dear Miriam,” Godfrid said ;
“Perchance it is a trifle overdue ;
But lo ! you pay me interest instead :—
I cross old scores, and we commence anew.
'Tis fortunate you came ; for in my head
There runs another sermon. Nay, 'tis true,
And I will preach it. Come, be patient, dear
See, there are only we, and waves, to hear.”

LXII.

“Suppose,”—and on the rocky ledge that lay
Between them and the leap to death below,
He spread the comely gifts,—“suppose that they
Who coaxed the unreflecting vine to throw
Its tendrils out, and trustingly display
Its swelling beads to heaven’s seductive glow,
When they were ripe and bursting, even as now,
Should turn away, and leave them on the bough?—

LXIII.

“Leave them to shrink and wizen in the wind,
For the hot sun that fostered root and stem,
To scorch their moist pulp, burn their cooling rind,
And all the airs of heaven to rifle them,
Though caves meanwhile with empty vats were lined,
And throats as dry as some trite apophthegm?
Suppose that this should happen,—here,—to-day,—
Here, in our Capri,—what would Miriam say?”

LXIV.

“Why, that the folks were mad. But there’s no fear.
Your parable lacks truth. Nay, look around!
The joyous vintage hours are circling near,
And wine-stirred feet ere long shall beat the ground.
They come, they come, the merry band! I hear
Our light-long toil in songs of plenty drowned;
We wreath our brows with vine-leaves, and we sing,
Whilst cape and creek with laughing echoes ring.”

LXV.

“Right merrily answered, Miriam, and right true.
Yet hearken to me, dear! There is a God,
To whom the God of Wine’s a deity new,
A thing of yesterday, a faun, a clod,
A tipsy nothing! Nay, I warrant you,
That long ere Bacchus breathed into the sod
The secret of the grape, the God of Love
Owned this fair world and shared the world above.

LXVI.

"Yes, wine is good ; it thaws the ice-bound breast,
And fancy's fretful-pawing steed unchains,
Rouses the torpid soul from churlish rest,
With floods of summer flushing wintry veins.
'Tis wine that flutters the poet in his nest,
Plumes his light wing and warms his liquid strains,
Curtails long nights, and hath the charm to steep
Outwearied limbs in deep undreaming sleep.

LXVII.

"Yes, wine is good, but love is better still ;
For it assails the pulses of the heart
With swift yet soft suffusions. Love can fill
Life's vacant hollows, worse than any smart,
With pleasant tumults, surging joys that thrill
The silent soul to music. 'Tis an art
Which maketh poets of us all ; we sing
Like Sappho's self, when love once tunes the string.

LXVIII.

"Its children are delicious dreams, that haunt
The brain awake or sleeping ; its bright lures
Alone confer the ecstasy they vaunt,
The one divine delirium that endures.
On love's light step attend no shadows gaunt,
And all its own sweet wounds its sweet self cures.
It fans but feeds the warmly-glowing flesh,
And slakes the thirst it still creates afresh.

LXIX.

“ But love, like these fair tokens of the vine,
Hath, too, its times and seasons. First, its spring ;
Days of sweet doubt and fear, when smiles like thine,
Daintier than tendrils, to the heart-strings cling.
Next, its enticing summer, when the bine
Of hope unfolds its tremulous covering,
And softly-swelling vows, love’s crowning gift,
Fed by its life-blood, peep through each green rift.

LXX.

“ Then, last of all, love’s luscious autumn time,
When all its dreams are ripened. Fear hath fled.
No more the heart suspicion’s chilling rime,
Or blight of scorching jealousy, need dread.
Love’s hour is here ; love’s vintage-bells may chime,
And love’s festoons be wreathed round board and bed.
He reels with ripeness : press his sweetness out,
Whilst Hymen’s songs the hills and valleys shout !

LXXI.

“ But haply should we scorn mature desire,
Nor love’s full-teeming wealth make haste to press,
Oh, then it shrivels of its own spurned fire,
And straight its goodly promise perishes.
Then shall no love-cup cheat the toils that tire,
Nor care be chased by wedlock’s staunch caress.
Yes, mad indeed, we have squandered all our store,
The harvest of our youth, which comes no more.

LXXII.

“ Ah ! heed me, heed me, Miriam ! for I speak
A parable that lacks nor truth nor aim.
Answer me truly : have I far to seek
To point the moral that I scarce need name ?
Do I not read in rosy-glowing cheek,
In palpitating veins, in eye aflame,
Love in your heart would build himself a nest,
So you will only house that gentle guest ?

LXXIII.

“ Why, why repel him, why, indeed, delay,
Since he hath come in so mature a guise ?
Look down ; 'tis Gilbert's bark that cleaves the spray
Far at our feet, his arm the oar that plies.
What if time's touch hath flecked his beard with grey,
It veils a breast more steadfast and more wise.
Ah ! Youth in man is fickle ! Not the fire
That warms the hearth, is fed on green desire.

LXXIV.

“ He is a noble gentleman and true,
Whom sorrow hath made sage. He loves you, dear,
And still will love you when the dazzling dew
Of youth no more shall on your cheeks appear.
I am no messenger ; no more than you,
Hath he confessed his secret to my ear.
But Love is a silent babbler, and I need
No words of his or yours, your hearts to read.

LXXV.

“Nor can you plead him alien in blood,
For he hath made your country’s cause his own.
Have I not seen him ’mid the sanguine flood
Through which she waded to her rightful throne,
And by the bayonet’s threat and cannon’s thud
Marked his tame port of peace heroic grown?
And when he deemed the hour to do or die
For Rome had struck, did not his soul reply?

LXXVI.

“Oh! hapless Aspromonte! Cursèd field,
And all too bitter hill! I was not there,
But saw him start, in resolution steeled,
Till his hurt Chieftain bade them all forbear.
And do you doubt that when the hour hath pealed
To rouse the baffled lion from his lair,
He too will fly from this delicious foam,
To fight,—who knows? perhaps to fall,—for Rome?”

LXXVII.

“O yes!” she answered, glowing as she spake,
His last words flushing her dark cheeks with fire,
“I know that he would die for Italy’s sake,
And that is why—I swear it by my sire,
My mother’s sacred dust, my country’s ache!—
I yet will give him all his soul’s desire!
Thou art my more than brother; he shall be
Second to none,—not, Godfrid, e’en to thee!

LXXVIII.

“Yet list to me in turn, albeit I sound
Beggar in speech that can enrich your tongue.
I said but now that none so mad were found,
Who, when these clusters full to falling hung
From stalk and stem, and o’er the happy ground
From tree to tree in drooping garlands swung,
Would scorn the sweet pulp bursting through its rind,
And leave the jocund juice to feed the wind.

LXXIX.

“But see! Our vintage dawns. Yet do you doubt,
That if to-morrow, though brave loins were girt,
Brisk sleeves knit up, our baskets spread about,
The scoured vats all agape for wine to spirt
Down their huge throats, we heard a sudden shout
Of ‘Rome or Death!’ and saw the brave red shirt
Flame like a beacon,—we should, one and all,
Leave vat, leave vine, responsive to the call?

LXXX.

“Should we not quit the harvest of the year,
To gather in the harvest of all time?
He,—you,—yes I!—leave grape and grain, nor fear
To reap ’mid thirst and want a store sublime?
Swords were our sickles then; the dewlapped steer
No more with purple loads our slopes would climb;
Its peaceful flanks ’neath warlike wains would foam,
Splashed with their blood who barred the path to Rome!

LXXXI.

“Bear with me then, I pray, my brother kind,
And bid him bear awhile whose love I prize.
So long as the Priest-King my kith shall bind
In Peter’s chains,—well, Rome hath all my sighs !
I have no heart for tenderness, no mind
For pillowed sweets, no ear for baby cries.
Oh ! I should blush, if conflict’s thrilling noise
Should reach me, cooing over selfish joys !”

LXXXII.

She ceased ; and he was silent in his soul,
Drinking her noble rhetoric. But while each
Watched mute the creamy ripples landwards roll,
Up the rude path that zigzagged from the beach,
A bright-eyed urchin, with a fluttering scroll,
Skipping and tumbling came,—too blown for speech ;
His damson-coloured cheeks with speed aglow,
And tangled curls, left in the breeze to blow.

LXXXIII.

Hearing the swift step, Godfrid turned his head,
And quick the little Mercury, pressed for breath,
Thrust in his hand the scroll, then, panting, said,
“Read—read ! the game’s afoot of ‘Rome or Death !’
See ! Garibaldi from his isle hath sped,
And the whole land to join him hasteneth.
All Naples is astir ; and look ! they write,
This time the King will cheer, not foil, the fight.”

LXXXIV.

And as he spake, and Godfrid scanned the scroll,
And saw that he spake true, again the shout
Of "Rome or Death!" burst on his startled soul.
And half-way down to wave, where juttet out
From skeleton crag a green and grassy mole,
Down-peering spied they Gilbert, waving about
A blood-red flag, and loud with lusty breath
Crying, "Come! Godfrid! Miriam! Rome or Death!"

LXXXV.

As swift as light, Miriam round Godfrid's neck
Flung tight her arms, but nigh as quickly loosed;
Then, without more ado or ever a check,
Down the steep path they ran, like streams unsluiced:
So fast, that soon the sunmits were a speck
Where late they stood,—the sea-bird's stormy roost.
And audibly now they heard the billows bound,
Which there had seemed to die without a sound.

LXXXVI.

And, ever as they sped, waxed loud and oft
The cry, "Rome, Rome or Death!" Each feathery holt,
Each sinuous down, each peak that pricked aloft,
Flung back the words, echoing the grand revolt.
And swift from vineyard, terrace, garden, croft,
As, straight on lightning, swoops the thunderbolt,
Flashed all the folk, in gathering crowd and roar,
And with one pulse descending to the shore.

LXXXVII.

As snows on heights of Apennine that long,
Silenced by Winter's iron hand, have lain,
When Spring weeps smiling tears, burst icy thong,
And, melting into music, bound amain
This way and that, through thousand channels throng,
Snatching each track that leads them to the plain,
Nor, till their swift erratic race is o'er,
In the broad valley's bosom blend once more ;

LXXXVIII.

So the rude people of that mountain home,
By frosty fetters longwhile hushed and cooped,
Hearing the vernal voice call from the foam,
Straight from their rock-set thresholds wildly trooped,
Streaming adown where scarce the goatherd clomb,
And leaping whence the curved-clawed falcon swooped ;
A swift and separate trackway scoured by each,
Until all met and mingled at the beach.

LXXXIX.

Thither too, whooping loud, thronged untamed boys,
Bare-browed, bare-breasted, gemmed with eager eyes,
With rapid questions heightening all the noise,
Then breaking off, nor waiting for replies.
And glowing maids were there, full ripe for joys
Not found in battle : Goddesses in size,
With massive pitchers on their heads, at ease
Standing like stalwart Caryatides ;

XC.

Nor moving lip, but with full gaze intent
On lovers yesternight intent to woo,
Who now no more coined words of blandishment,
But arched their blades, and felt the edge was true.
'Twixt their fair serried shoulders, forwards leant,
With craning necks and faces sharp to view,
Low-chattering crones, wailing the lonely lot
Of these thus left, who heard but heeded not.

XCI.

And, last of all, grave matrons joined the throng,
Babes upon arm, that only lisped as yet
The words of Rome and mother ;—grave and strong,
With thoughtful brows and eyes, but cheeks unwet :
While 'mong the crowd bent greybeards hobbled along,
Blessing the Lord that, ere their sun had set,
They had seen this day ; yet railing half at Fate,
That sent salvation, for their aid too late.

XCII.

Then high debate arose who first should go,
Who linger last, and who at home must stay.
Some, fledged with shafts of death from tip to toe,
Vowed none should snatch or turn them from the fray ;
Some could a rusty matchlock only show,
And some a rough-edged bill-hook but display ;
These from the hearth had snatched up smouldering brands,
And those had brawny thews but empty hands.

XCIII.

But once upon the mainland, arms would swift
For all be found. And, as they babbled, came
Women and girls with many a farewell gift :
Strings of fat quails for which the isle hath fame,
And figs distilling honey through each rift
In their moist pulp ; bread, worthy sure to name
E'en as to give ; huge bunches from the vine
Now newly plucked ; and flasks of rosy wine.

XCIV.

Meanwhile from where, under the frowning cliff,
In days gone by long waves had worn a cave,
Godfrid and Gilbert dragged a gallant skiff,
And straight the sharp keel through the shingle drave.
A moment at the sand-bar halting stiff,
It heeled, then lurched ; and as it touched the wave,
The waters rose to take it, and it lay
Trembling with gladness on the circling spray.

XCV.

Her uncowed face lit by a steadfast smile,
Into the boat first Miriam lightly stepped ;
Two sinewy youths, the pick of all the isle,
Followed, and briskly to their places leapt ;
Then Gilbert, and last Godfrid. Poised awhile,
Down swooped the oars, and swift away they swept :
The lined shore crying after them, "Death or Rome !
Swift speed your bark ! we follow in its foam."

XCVI.

Then like to her that erst, when Egypt's host
Pursued God's people and the Red Sea ford
Opened and closed upon the heathen boast,
Snatched timbrel up and magnified the Lord ;
So Miriam now, as further fled the coast,
In jubilant song her swelling soul outpoured,
And 'twixt the bright blue sky and deep blue main,
In the blue air rang out this sounding strain !

I.

Through scarred Chiusa's choked ravine
Fierce-foaming Dora flows,
Whose sons have ever fearless been
As its sun-gazing snows.
Past Casentino's fruitful vale
See smiling Arno glide,
To where fair Florence, famed in tale,
Glow like a youthful bride.
'Mong green Venafrò's olive slopes
Volturno twists and winds,
And, laughing, triples all the hopes
Of Capua's happy hinds.
'Tis only Tiber—Tiber,—crawls,
Sullen from swamp to sea.
Awake, ye deaf ! Arise, ye thralls !
Country cries, Freedom calls ;
And by all the Gods, maugre all the Gauls,
O Italy, wronged Italy,
Thou shalt be one and free !

2.

The Lombard, stayed by no man's frown,
Treads his well-watered fields,
And shakes the nutty harvest down
From Como's waving wealds.
Singing till dusk, with vacant breast,
Love-ditties o'er and o'er,
The easy Tuscan drops to rest
Amid his ample store.
For teeming herds and fleecy flocks
The Apulian spurns the share ;
Moist swathes, plump fruits, and full-eared shocks,
Crown the Campanian's care.
Why then alone round Rome's wide walls
Should barren deserts be ?
Snatch blade and brand, O famished thralls !
Country cries, Freedom calls ;
And by all the Gods, maugre all the Gauls,
Fair, stranger-trampled Italy,
Thou must be one and free !

3.

Shorn of its shackles, Venice feels
The vulture's beak no more,
And lightly speed the unclogged keels
Along the Oscan shore.
His sleek-skinned team and swaying pole
The free Æmilian drives ;
Safe sows and reaps the Romagnole,
Loosed from the shaveling's gyves.
Vesuvius answers Ætna's fires,
Mainland and isle join hands,

And men and maids in joyous choirs
Dance on Sicilian sands.
What ! And shall peal in Rome's great halls
No note of pride or glee ?
Up from your knees, ye priest-crushed thralls !
Country cries, Freedom calls ;
And by all the Gods, maugre all the Gauls,
Resuscitated Italy,
Thou shalt be one and free !

XCVII.

Thus rippling died the note o'er broad blue bay,
Now smooth as cheek of childhood. Not a speck
Of foam or surf, save as they clave their way,
Broke the expanse from headland neck to neck.
Faster they seemed to spurn the following spray,
Than mortal keel which winds and waters check,
And, spite the rhythmic strokes doughtily given,
On to the mainland rather drawn than driven.

XCVIII.

Now on the left rough Massa rose to view,
Now soft Sorrento. Then they swept along
Past populous shores where vine-veiled ashes strew
Cities which echoed once to dance and song.
Far to the right dark Ischia flecked the blue,
Where Nature's penitent hand smooths ancient wrong ;
And soon the mighty mountain 'gan to loom,
That floods with streams of death its fiery womb.

XCIX.

Till close behind them now they caught the hum
Of many voices, and the rising roar
Of noisy Naples, mingled with the strum
And twang of sharp guitar along the shore.
A moment more, and with the cry "We come,"
Bare-legged and Phrygian-capped, upon them bore
A rush of boatmen, voluble of speech,
Who drew the light skiff swiftly up the beach.

C.

Then out they sprang,—first Miriam, Gilbert next,
Last Godfrid,—and the eager host pressed round ;
Rude fishermen, hoarse women half unsexed,
And nude sea-urchins frisking o'er the ground.
Each with chaotic shouts their ears perplexed,
Question and answer in the hubbub drowned,
O'er which there surged alone, as springs the foam
Above loud waves, the cry of "Death or Rome!"

CI.

But as they thrust the phrensied crowd aside,
And pushed on to the city's beating heart,
At every step their hopes grew verified,
And warlike omens bade their doubts depart.
Men, new in arms, gathering from far and wide,
Made but a martial muster-ground the mart.
Churches were changed to barracks ; and the cars
Of Ceres' self were given up to Mars.

CII.

The very streets volcanic seemed and roared
Like Somma's fiery self, and seething flowed
With streams of living lava, ever poured
Hot from the City's innermost abode.
And, over all, ever and anon there soared
Convulsive detonations, such as goad
To agony of madness feet that fly
Wavewards, when roused Vesuvius shells the sky !

CIII.

And then night fell, and fairy lamps shone out
From balcony and lattice. High in air,
Gay gonfalons were lightly blown about,
And at the windows crowded faces fair.
Shrill lads upon the pavement thronged to shout
The great news forth, and in the shining square,
Hard by the Palace, flushed with jets of light,
Men stood in groups and fought the coming fight.

CIV.

Just ere the hour drew near for lamps to fade
And the black crowd to melt away to rest,
Far up Toledo shrilling trumpets brayed.
Straight at the sound, thither all footsteps pressed,
And, as if ranged for battle's stern parade,
Formed in deep files and long lines drawn abreast,
And, close in phalanx packed, with ringing cheer,
"Evviva Italia ! Evviva !" rent the ear.

CV.

Rang out once more the clarion's cleaving blare,
And rudely rumbled hollow-bowelled drum ;
Then strains of martial music stormed the air,
And away they strode, steps sounding but lips dumb.
But at the windows, still, cheered voices fair,
And waved white kerchiefs gallantly ; while some
Sweet flowers drew forth from bosoms yet more sweet,
And showered them down to kiss the tramping feet.

CVI.

When, with a sudden and barbaric clang,
The strong soft music snapped, the phalanxed crowd
Timing their voices by their footsteps sang
In unison a chorus long and loud.
It was a strain to scare the despot's fang,
And wake the sleeping patriot in his shroud ;
And, as it died, again the bellowing cry,
" Evviva Italia ! Evviva ! " stunned the sky.

CVII.

Then midnight tolled, and all the city was still.
Inarime lay darkling on the sea ;
Faint spikes of flame tipped Somma's murky hill,
And on the shore the waves died silently.
The fabled fields the Mantuan's wizard quill
Steeps in undying glamour, seemed to be
Once more Elysian, and the night-winds lay
Cradled on Baiæ's ruin-pebbled bay.

CVIII.

Bewitching land ! How oft, 'mid cold gray skies,
Mist-blurred horizons, landscapes chilled with rime,
Have I not yearned with long-forbidden eyes
For one more vision of your sunny clime !
Oh ! more than e'en the hart e'er pants and sighs
For the delicious waterbrooks, I climb
The heights of beckoning hope, and from afar
Strain to behold you, even as you are !

CIX.

For in my boyhood, with no boy's disdain,
I scanned the classic tale. The Sibyl's cave,
Cumæ's dread grot, the charred Phlegræan plain,
Avernus' lethal lake, and wave-washed grave,
Where, silent long, clarion and oar have lain
That helped Æneas o'er the Tyrrhene wave,—
These, ere I touched them verily, were the goal
Of my mind's eye, and fired my tender soul.

CX.

Came youth, and by thy haunted strand I strayed,
Alone, though not an exile, save as those
Infected with youth's phantasies are made
To walk apart, and nursed intangible woes
In thy soft smiles ; and now, whene'er down weighed
By manhood's ills, the sad old yearning grows
For thy bright shores, and, wearied with life's gloom,
To seek—what Virgil found,—a sunny tomb !

CXI.

Gay broke the morn, and now along the land,
On with the day the joyous tidings grew ;
Passed the fleet spray round Spartivento's strand,
And raced with Manfredonia's billows blue.
Swifter than falcon by Libeccio fanned,
Up the long crook-backed Apennine it flew,
And, lithe as mists by sunrise skywards drawn,
Scaled Alpine heights and, bright, proclaimed the dawn.

CXII.

It brought the lilies out in Florence fair,
Flooded with life Bologna's grim arcades,
Fluttered the doves in Venice' marble square,
Filled Milan's thrifty streets with generous blades.
Perugia's griffin laid his talons bare,
The lion leaped from Padua's learned shades ;
And Turin's generous beast, prompt at the sound,
Lowered his horned front, and, pawing, shook the ground.

CXIII.

In many a busy street swart sons of toil,
Humming their ditties full in mid-day glare,
As with quick hands they mixed the glutinous soil,
Or, perched on dizzying scaffolds high in air,
Laid straight the stone or chipped the quaint gargoyle,
Or with sharp chisel carved the cornice fair,
Smote by the cry, suspended stroke and song,
And swarmed below to swell the frantic throng.

CXIV.

They left the half-mixed mortar where it lay,
Flung down the rule, the trowel cast aside,
Whilst rope and pulley o'er the public way
Vacantly hung, unfreighted and unplied.
In suburbs, long with noise of labour gay,
Sound of reverberating hammer died.
The stern assessor at the Gate his dues
Forgot to claim, and rushed to glean the news.

CXV.

Good-natured mimes, conning their coming parts,
Flooding with fabled tears their facile eyes,
Loading with fancied love-throes their soft hearts,
Or swelling out their limbs to kingly size,
With well-aped mien defying tyrants' smarts,
Swift at the call doffed feeble masks and lies,
Grasped genuine swords, mock patriots no more,
Nor played with blood, who soon should taste of gore.

CXVI.

They too who still nooks keep 'mid city's bray,
Moulding their plastic dreams, or move among
Colours that live beyond life's little day,
Scared by the tumult, to their windows sprung,
The welcome watchwords caught, and rushed away ;
Leaving the tints unfinished fancy flung,
Or the dim forms, dawning through marble shell,
Till their return in solitude to dwell.

CXVII.

Ah! will they e'er return? Or must those fair
But only half-fledged shapes lie wombed for aye,
Fast in their embryonic limbo there,
Like unbaptizèd innocents doomed to stay
In a dim purgatory, barred to prayer,
Denied the dark, denied the light of day;
While they who should have lent them life and breath,
Float down the stream of unreturning death?

CXVIII.

Ah! will they e'er return? They did not ask,
But thronged unheeding to the feast of steel,
Blithely as schoolboys sally from their task,
And gay as gallant, when the joy-bells peal,
Strides to his bridal, or with quick-lowered casque
To mimic tourney plies the rowelled heel.
Pledged they not "Rome or Death!"? And they that try
Immortal deeds, can scarcely fear to die.

CXIX.

Nor these alone, but hearts of humbler strain,
Rose to the heights of valour. Hands that wield
The craven instruments of feeble gain,
Clamoured for weapons of the priceless field;
Since noble brows no longer looked disdain
On villain thews that brandished sword and shield.
All men were foster-brothers now, and pressed
Illustrious kinship from their country's breast.

CXX.

Far off upon the mountain's marble side,
 In rough-hewn amphitheatres whose bold tiers,
 Scaling the sky, white crowned with blue, defied
 With unprotected front the storms of years,—
 Round huge blocks coiling nervous ropes tight-tied,
 Or urging sinewy bullocks with goads and jeers,
 Carrara's sun-scorched toilers, at the sound
 Unwonted, paused, and wildly stared around.

CXXI.

'Twas louder, deeper, longer than the roar
 That rocks and rends the giant-bowelled hills,
 When quarrying blast tears down the mountain hoar,
 And the scarred gorge with echoing thunder fills.
 Hark, how beyond where wreaths sulphureous soar,
 It rings, and rises, and the welkin thrills,
 And with reverberating summons calls
 For hands like theirs to breach Rome's crumbling walls !

CXXII.

Steadying with brawny thews through rich brown soil
 The unwieldy antique plough that Rhea's son
 Drave round his regal Palatine, lusty swains
 The challenge heard, and, as at signal gun,
 Left the unfinished furrow ; left their wains
 Standing half-piled ; left their sleek oxen dun ;
 Left helpful wife, smooth babe, and clambering boy,
 Nor stopped to snatch one desultory joy.

CXXIII.

Here had the purple vintage just begun,
Here it was drawing to its golden close ;
And there beyond, its bright mid-course was run,
Gay figures glinting 'mong the verdant rows.
Voice upon voice was singing in the sun
The virtues of the vine that routs our woes,
Spurs bashful youth with warmly bold desires,
And thaws the virgin's veins with subtle fires.

CXXIV.

When lo ! above the rhythmical ebb and swell
Of genial hymn, and chorus lustily cried,
Surged one strong note, loud as that brave old bell
With which Capponi Charles's threat defied.
There was no ear so dull but knew it well,
No lip so slow but "Rome or Death !" replied ;
No heart so sordid, but the crowning store
Of the year's toil enslaved its care no more.

CXXV.

They left the long unstrung festoons half-stripped,
The tall deep crates half-filled, the vats unpressed,
In the first trough their hands empurpled dipped,
Doffed work-day gear, and called for gay red vest ;
Then, with brief, brave farewells, away they slipped,
Eager as fledglings from forsaken nest,
And not one hand was raised to bid them stay,
One tear let fall to clog them on their way.

CXXVI.

No need had they to ask which path was theirs,
More than the runnels from the mountain's brow
'Mong myriad streams, or in a flight of stares
Vanguard or rearguard whither it shall plough
The airy track, which wing to wing declares.
For every hamlet was a beacon now,
And each man's tongue a tocsin. Does its way
The tide or tempest doubt? No more did they.

CXXVII.

True as the needle to the northern pole,
All eyes were set towards Rome, and there abode.
The very babes in arms, with gesture droll,
Held out their little dimpled fists, and showed
The line that looked the straightest to the goal,
As those that scarce could run, marked out the road.
Rest none required ; but, ever and anon,
Fair hands brought food and drink, and sped them on.

CXXVIII.

And Godfrid, Gilbert, Miriam, like the rest,
Ever on foot, now journeying 'mong the crowd,
Now solitary skirting Samnian crest,
Trackless, by many a dried-up torrent ploughed,
On towards the Roman frontier panting pressed,
Nor halted till they saw Alatri proud
Look down on Colleparado, and descried
Soft Liris winding round rough Sora's side.

CXXIX.

But to the sword's goal nearer as they drew,
Omens of slackening purpose met their feet.
Men 'gan to ask each other what they knew.
Had not the Royal drums been heard to beat?
And were not those the Royal trumpets, blew?
Yet could it be they did but sound retreat,
Without one blow to break the bonds that wed
Longwhile the living to the loathsome dead?

CXXX.

"Ay, Rome or Death!" said scornful tongues. "But mark
Which way the Gallic weathercock shall point.
It sets to fair! Then, gallant hearts, embark!
Stay! Look, it veers to foul! Great deeds, aroynt!
Be sheathed, ye swords! Encompass us, O dark,
And hide our hopes! The times are out of joint.
Swift to the frontier! fling the rash fools back!
What boot brute blades, when kingly brows are black?"

CXXXI.

"'Twas but a purblind chanticler that crowed;
The dawn is not yet here. Sleep on; 'tis night,—
'Tis night, we say. Skulk each to his abode,
And snore till central suns proclaim the light.
The bright presumptuous star that erewhile showed
In mimicry of day, is quenched quite!
Abed once more, till the true orient gleams,
And lull your fluttering hopes with feeble dreams!"

CXXXII.

And with these dominant commands there came
Confounding rumours, such as rend the soul
Of solid purpose ; gusts that blow the flame
Of bright resolve now high now low, and roll
Round it a vaporous smoke, and thuswise lame
The limbs of those it lanterns to the goal ;
Rumours begot by hope on fear, and nursed
By spite, malignant hag that loves the worst.

CXXXIII.

Where was the Chief? Had he yet left his isle?
Yes ; foiling nimble lurchers of the law,
He treads the mainland. Did a sceptic smile?
Swift was the answer : here is one who saw . . .
Ay ! but how now ? A dungeon's well-clamped pile
Coffins his rashness. He will burst it . . . Faugh !
Back to Caprera, oath-bound, see him led,
To gnaw his heart out on its barren bed !

CXXXIV.

Godfrid the loud sardonic babble heard,
Silent and gloomy. 'Neath a trellised vine,
As evening paled, chary of heed or word,
He sate with Miriam. Flask of Volscian wine
And fare by hospitable hands preferred,
Untasted stood. And when, at Miriam's sign,
The host withdrew, neither the silence broke,
Till, Gilbert, suddenly entering, thuswise spoke.

CXXXV.

“’Tis as we feared. The King clanks back his blade
Into the scabbard, and we stand alone.
The royal troops, late marshalled to invade,
Now guard, the frontiers of the priestly throne.
Some they turn back by force, and some persuade ;
Some through their nets have broken, and are flown
Towards Mentana, resolute for Rome,
Save the Chief fail them too, and call them home.”

CXXXVI.

So saying, mute he stood, biding reply.
But Miriam, who, the while he spoke, had gazed
On him alone, now glanced with anxious eye
Towards where sate Godfrid, with his face upraised
And propped upon his hand reflectingly ;
Over whose aspect suddenly there blazed
The light of hot resolve, and, starting up,
He seized the flask and drained a brimming cup.

CXXXVII.

And as he laid it down, “Too late,” he cried,
“To turn back now ! See ! I will go with you.
In vain we would discern ; the Fates decide,
And fool us to the task they’d have us do.
So will I not be wanting at your side,
Though deep I pray we shall not live to rue
The madness of this hour. I cannot stem
The waves I loosed not. I must ride with them :

CXXXVIII.

“E’en be it to dismay. But, Gilbert, this,
This bear in mind, if I should fall, you stay :
Though destiny now shapes my steps amiss,
And I am by its current swept away,
I drew the sword, only to bridge the abyss
Which severs Rome from Italy ; and say,
If chance some voice of my last deed inquires,
He ne’er assailed the altar of his sires.

CXXXIX.

“Enough,—alas ! too much,—of my poor name ;
But there be those whom I, in death, would spare.
Now, go with Miriam where the tongue of fame
Reports our camp : I will towards Rome repair,
And learn if chains have made her courage tame,
Or if, not too disheartened still to dare,
She finds her feet, and through her prison walls
Answers the voice of Liberty that calls.”

CXL.

“Now farewell, Miriam ! Gilbert be your guide
Till I unto you both my steps retrace.”
Whereat she rose, and going to his side,
Soft laid against his beard her tender face,
And murmured : “For your journey Heaven provide !”
Then he to her gave brotherly embrace,
And, grasping Gilbert’s hand, as brave men do,
Went, and ’mong vine-slopes vanished from their view.

CXLI.

And when the morrow's dawn broke wild and red,
Afoot once more, Gilbert and Miriam clomb
Many a hill-side, crossed many a torrent's bed,
Tracking through shaggy woods, past tumbling foam,
That faithful band who, by one instinct led,
Swarmed at the Sabine heights that look towards Rome ;
There where Nomentum still keeps, half consoled,
Its Latin name and Bacchic fame of old.

CXLII.

And these, if few, yet steadfast, o'er the rim
Which severed still the freedman from the slave,
Had crept or burst, and in embattled trim,
Five thousand breasts, wooed glory or the grave.
Purged of the waifs that on the surface swim
Of noisy venture's swift but shallow wave,
Shrunk was their volume now, calm, gathered, deep,
E'en as the cataract's, ere adown it leap.

CXLIII.

But on the mountainous ledge that dips towards Rome,
They still hung pausing ; for the Chief yet lagged.
Cursed be the knaves that to his far-off home
Had yet again his limbs reluctant dragged !
Fools ! would they coop the winds or curb the foam ?
Soon flashed the news upon their spirits fagged,
That he unhelped had slipped the net once more,
And wind and wave were wafting him to shore.

CXLIV.

Yes ! steering tiny shallop, all alone,
From rock to rock 'mid perilous shoals, then tost
On tumbling billows by the mistral blown,
Till space 'twixt sea and sky seemed well-nigh lost,
Long ere the snarer guessed their bird was flown,
He gripped Sardinia's coast, its mountains crossed,
And thence by leal hands led and fair gales fanned,
Near Leghorn's beach leaped once again to land.

CXLV.

Never did group of orient devotees,
Whose triune God blends fire, and warmth, and light,
And who with straining eyeballs, prayerful knees,
And pulse impatient watch the sun first smite
The Persian hill-tops, hunger more than these
To see their sun-god, banisher of night,
Flame over the horizon, scare delay
With his couched beams, and reinstate the day.

CXLVI.

Look, look ! He cometh ! a grey-crimson dawn,
A luminous apparition, scattering far
Chill mists of dim suspense, rollingly drawn
At sullen heel of night's retiring car.
Now peers broad day, decked like a dappled fawn,
On whose fair forehead gleams a dewy star,
And which from covert brakes and darkling trees
Comes on apace, and freshly courts the breeze.

CXLVII.

Then swift to arms and flashing ranks they flew,
Shoulder to shoulder, heart by brave heart, ranged,
Quick with whose every beat He nearer drew.
Yes! 'twas the Chief, from venture unestranged,
As when his grasp the Bourbon hydra slew
At tough Marsala, and a kingdom changed.
Upon his brow were threatening thunders piled,
But round his mouth love's playful lightnings smiled.

CXLVIII.

"My children!" when their jubilant welcome waned,
With resonant clear voice he said, "I am here.
The French-Jove's minions thought to hold me chained,
Lest I spread fire through this cimmerian sphere.
Oh! how his eagle rent me, as I strained
To rid me of my rock's engyving gear!
But herculean destiny, which foils
Olympian counsels, came and cut my toils.

CXLIX.

"And lo! I stand amongst you yet once more,
Sons of my heart and scions of my soul!
I see ye are still, all that ye were of yore,
The valorous stuff Alcmene's self might foal.
Behind, lies shame in ambush,—peril before.
Which do ye choose? Speak! whither is our goal?"
He paused; and like a thunderclap, the breath
Of their charged breasts roared loud, "To Rome or Death!"

CL.

"'Tis well. Look there!" And as he spake they turned,
Following his finger with immediate eyes.
"There, there is the vent for which your lives have burned,
Your goal or grave, your sepulchre or prize.
Gods! where the suckling she-wolf's bosom spurned
The cruel priest's decision, darkly wise,
The foul hyæna's bastard litter tugs
At Italy's breast, poisoning our Mother's dugs!

CLI.

"Will ye not, stalwart war-hounds, help me scare
The unclean foster-whelps from such a shrine?—
This brood of Hell, that Heaven's fair front would wear,
From hearths which, even in ruin, keep divine;
Ruins, your own inheritance? Now swear
By all the godhood in Rome's royal line,
By the Republic's virtue, by the brow
Of Empire calm, ye will reclaim them now!

CLII.

"Lend me your youth, I give to you my years,
The steadfast wisdom of the life that hangs
Upon death's gaze and calmly waits the shears,
Nor cares o'ermuch when the dark portal clangs.
So that I see the glimmer of your spears
Frighting the foemen's eyes, and mark your fangs
Fast in the hirelings fleeing from the list
Of final war, then let me be dismissed.

CLIII.

“My task will then be finished. But I waste
In sterile words the sunlight. Now, to arms!
Yon citadel, within whose walls disgraced
A host of motley mercenaries swarms,
The savour of your valour first shall taste.
Now blow the sanguine bugle’s shrill alarms!
Cleansed of its levy of Batavian boors,
Monte Rotondo must, ere dark, be yours!”

CLIV.

Scarce had the order died upon his lips,
Than loud the clarion’s circling summons rang.
But, as the lightning thunder-peal outstrips,
So, ere the notes were out, the martial gang
Glittered in arms, and as the staghound slips
The chiding leash, unto the foray sprang.
Youth in their hearts, hope in their eyes there gleamed,
And victory a beckoning goddess seemed.

CLV.

Though light their panoply, their valour great.
No Vulcan’s limping thunderbolts delayed
With cumbrous help their impetus elate;
Theirs the straight barrel and the swooping blade,
The fleet advance—the pause—the crouching gait—
The forward rush—the well-seized ambushade;
Till in thin trusty lines spread out, they feel
The circled city with a grasp of steel.

CLVI.

Then straight its pulse responded. Loudly bayed
The deep-mouthed cannon from the walls, and woke
The slumbering citadel, which swiftly made
Its mouth a teeming womb whence martial folk,
Born ready-armed, swarmed to the rampart's aid,
Crested the walls, and glimmered through the smoke
Of sulphurous din, whose war-clouds thundered black
'Gainst the long sinuous hills, that bellowed back.

CLVII.

Through such tough mail how find or force a way?
Like wave on wave of the untiring tide
Some granite cliff still shivers into spray,
Or like to sharp-toothed sleuth-hounds swept aside
And gored by antlered fugitive at bay,
So was their fury now by force defied,
Their rolling crests of valour beaten back,
And each fresh spring and grip a foiled attack.

CLVIII.

No ponderous bolts of dead destruction hewed
A path to let their living fervour through,
'Gainst foes that winged, behind safe ramparts mewed,
Their shaftless barbs, invisible to view;
Though they with overt breasts and courage nude
Afresh their baffled onset must renew,
Making their lives a target, and its breath,
When spent, a bootless sacrifice to death.

CLIX.

Full many a dauntless form, nor scar nor scathe
Amid Melazzo's decimating fray,
Courting, that won, nor when they helped to bathe
Volutno's river red, bore scratch away,
Now thickly swelled death's long and languid swathe,
And, their late bravery low, close-sickled lay ;
Thin streams of blood dabbling their limbs forlorn,
As crimson poppies streak the down-cut corn.

CLX.

Still catechumens, did Marsala's field
With sanguine chrism their soaring souls baptize ;
Calatifi's blows their pledges sealed,
Their faith confirmed, their ardour rendered wise.
And now war's last anointment here annealed
Their stiffening limbs, and closed their filmy eyes ;
And to where men nor fret nor slaughter, they
In agony of battle passed away.

CLXI.

"Fire me the gate!" the Chief exclaimed, "and smoke
These skulking vermin from their darksome holes!
Why waste your breath in many an idle stroke
Against the intangible air? Unearth the moles!
Look! you must break the shell to seize the yolk!
Then fire the gate, ye young and valorous souls!
Swiftly let torch and faggot be their guests,
And burn yourselves an entrance to their breasts!"

CLXII.

Then, under cover of the deepening dusk,
As now the foe, in fancied fastness, drowned
With draughts of cheering wine the homely rusk,
Weening the day with conquering laurels crowned,—
With fascines girt and many a well-dried husk
Of last year's corn, soft to the gate they wound,
Whose solid jaws, deemed doubly safe till dawn,
Stood grimly clenched, with all the guards withdrawn.

CLXIII.

Others too brought, but with like stealthy stride,
Bales of coarse tow in liquid resin steeped,
With kegs of shining pitch, and,—high and wide,
Faggot on straw, straw upon faggot heaped,—
Thrust them between, and then their torches plied.
Swift at the touch the prompt light crackling leaped,
And, darting tongues of fire from quivering frame,
Spread through the loose sere heap its own fierce flame.

CLXIV.

Nor till the goodly pile was all ablaze,
Was the alarm raised within ; when straight
The slack carousers, smitten with amaze,
Snatching their arms, rushed wildly to the gate.
But those into the darkness, far from gaze,
Softly drew off, instructed well to wait
And pour, with obvious aim that could not fail,
Through its reopening jaws a deadly hail.

CLXV.

And soon, the monstrous bars and bolts drawn back,
The huge gates groaned, then slowly opened wide,
And straight in front uprose the blazing stack,
Though through its gaps no foe could be descried.
So 'gan they all, emboldened, to attack
The burning barricade, and thrust aside
This fell approach of fire that strove to spread
To their defences its contagion dread.

CLXVI.

Thus as they rushed with ardour to undo
The invisible assailants' crafty task,
And with unguarded breasts swarmed full in view
Of those who wore the distance for a mask,
Came sudden such a crashing volley through
The screen of sputtering twig and boiling cask,
That, staggering, back they fell, and, ambushed mesh
Dreading at hand, rolled back the gate afresh.

CLXVII.

But ere its ponderous lips could meet and clang,
The fiery mass fell in and choked its jaws.
Then once again a rattling volley rang
Straight through the chasm, and, all unseen the cause,
With deadly aim dealt many a mortal pang.
Then silence came,—a momentary pause,—
Then blinding smoke ; and then, all barriers snapped,
The gate, without, within, in flame was wrapped.

CLXVIII.

Still through the night the well-fed bonfire rose,
Blackening the sky, lighting up all below,
From rolling plain where crumbling Tiber flows,
To fixed Soracte still uncapped with snow.
On many a ruin Fate and fiercer foes
Had desolate left and void, a lurid glow,
Flickering, it flung, and flushed the long since sucked,
Dry, withered limbs of gray, gaunt aqueduct.

CLXIX.

The wolfish watch-dogs from uneasy sleep,
As though the moon were up, uprose and bayed,
While the rude herd, slow-roused from slumbers deep,
Crept from his hutch and the weird sight surveyed.
Leaning with hands that neither sow nor reap
On his long crook, there statue-like he stayed,
As one who wondered not, and in whose veins
The instinct flowed of fire and ravaged plains.

CLXX.

Unsheltered kine in unhelped labour lowed,
Coupling their throes with yet more deep dismay ;
There, stolid oxen, freed from yoke and goad,
Rolled their large eyes, and wondered was it day.
Troops of wild colts, no lord as yet bestrode,
Gathered in clouds, stopped, sniffed, then tore away ;
And low-browed buffaloes, into terror lashed,
Through jungled swamp, snorting and bellowing, splashed.

CLXXI.

It seemed as though the centuries had rolled
Their sepulchres back, and all the disarmed dead
Were coming forth anon, and, as of old,
Round Rome's seductive realm of ruin spread,
Would in their coils its feeble walls enfold,
And on its wreck a fresh destruction shed ;
That Goth, Gaul, Vandal, Hun, did all conspire
To wrap what yet remained, in final fire !

CLXXII.

And still the greedy flames kept crawling round
Monte Rotondo's ivy-buttressed wall,
Whence gloomy owls, as if from under ground,
Flapped out, and with their melancholy call
Would ever and anon the deepening swound
Of dying ears with fantasies appal,
Vexing their souls with terror as they sank
Through yielding life into the deep dread blank.

CLXXIII.

Nor till the dappled curtain of the East
Rose on the chorused dawn,—by surfeit choked,
Had the fierce fire from random foray ceased.
But long ere then, their sleepless limbs yet smoked
With grime of battle, and their rage increased
By yestreen's blood that still their garments soaked,
With bayonet couched and fury-flashing sword,
Through the charred portal had the Red-shirts poured.

CLXXIV.

And still as they advanced, from thresholds freed
Came forth the exultant populace, and blessed
The arms that brought salvation to its need.
Their blackened hands the trembling grandsire pressed ;
The tearful matron brought the welcome meed
Of mother's kiss ; the soft-eyed maid caressed ;
Whose brothers swelled their ranks, to lead them where
The routed hirelings clung to central lair.

CLXXV.

In a grim palace whose huge entrance seemed
Portcullis more than hospitable gate,
And through whose grim-barred embrasures there streamed
No ray of cheering sunshine soon or late,
Whose hoary walls were but too truly deemed
To boast the dungeon's thickness,—desperate,
And like to wolves whom baying throats surround,
The cowering foe had final covert found.

CLXXVI.

But when once more the threat of fire was hurled,
And torch and bavin to their hold were brought,
Till round the basement tall the black smoke curled,
Quick from within a parley was besought,
And high o'erhead a small white flag unfurled.
Curt the conditions. These : All who had fought,
Would in the courtyard pile both gun and blade,
And straight across the frontier be conveyed.

CLXXVII.

So on the morn of that auspicious day,
By valour wrenched, Monte Rotondo fell,
Making fagged limbs with freshening triumph gay,
And sinking hearts with surging hope re-swell
That henceforth neither foe nor fate could stay
Their supreme star and front invincible.
Lo ! Yonder column rose, and tower, and dome,
In the blue air ! Why not at once to Rome ?

CLXXVIII.

But quick the Chief with tranquillising smile
Checked their untimely ardour. " Not to-day.
Blown with the race of victory, breathe awhile,
Nor tempt too much your yet but mortal clay.
Another morn, and yon cross-crown'd pile,
That glistens in the sun, shall point your way ;
Nor shall its dome above the twilight soar,
A second time, ere Rome be God's once more ! "

CLXXIX.

So wounds were blithely drest, and blood-stains dried,
And, as day broadened, short siestas snatched ;
Some, stretched supine on the bare mountain-side,
Some, slumber-shaded under a pine detached.
And some lay gashed and shattered, open-eyed,
On pallets rough in hovels rudely-thatched ;
And some, alack ! in their last bed were laid,
Nor heard o'erhead the beating of the spade.

CLXXX.

Far as the eye could scan,—and that, how far !—
No faintest mote flecked the crystalline air ;
No fleecy cloudlet's zephyr-driven car
Sailed the blue dome, suspended everywhere ;
The enthroned sun, day's solitary star,
Steeped near and distant in a regal glare.
No fume of earth his godlike sway profaned,
And o'er his realms a shimmering silence reigned.

CLXXXI.

Lo ! gaping temples with their gods all flown !
Lo ! sacred founts whose waters well no more !
Niches, where statues long since overthrown
Leave concave void, mocking the might of yore !
Foundations scattered, soaring columns prone,
Wrecks of past tempests on a gaining shore,
From whose untrodden waste and stranded weeds,
The tide of Empire hour by hour recedes !

CLXXXII.

Here Nature weaved, from her invisible skein,
Unfading tapestry for roofless rooms ;
There, stripped by lust of time, full many a fane
Bared to the gaze their desecrated wombs.
Arch upon arch, striding the long-drawn plain,
Mute guides that led, straight to the land of tombs,
Sudden stopped short, as though astonished grown,
Loth to advance, and bade you go alone !

CLXXXIII.

But at the base of circumambient hills,
Rome's waves of rolling blight break vain and die.
On Sabine slopes Plenty her horn refills,
And the ploughed earth laughs to the unploughed sky.
See, like a babe some gentle mother stills,
Its fretful Anio hushed, warm Tivoli lie,
It almost seems, crushed rather than caressed,
In a deep dimple of their sinuous breast.

CLXXXIV.

Where burst the figs more honeyed or more fair,
Than where Frascati keeps the fame alive
Of philosophic Tusculum ; or where
Do patriarchal olives deeper dive
Than in the clods cleaved by the Alban share,
Grown in Ariccia's woods ? Where lustier thrive
The full-veined, breast-shaped pendants of the vine,
Than on Lavinia's Juno-blest incline ?

CLXXXV.

Nature withstands the shock of man's decay ;
No rust of time her glowing hue corrodes ;
A thousand sorrows leave her aspect gay ;
She smiles, forgetful, over wrecked abodes.
The popular breath, the despot's splendid sway,
Our shifting passions, oscillating modes,
Ephemeral creeds, changed gods, and altered goal,
Shake not the tenor of her firm-set soul.

CLXXXVI.

Deep in her heart the mighty secret lies
Which reconcileth hope and fear with Fate ;
Yet she surrenders to our yearning eyes
Nought to instruct us, save her mien sedate.
In vain philosophy close questioning plies,
In vain her shrine would science penetrate.
Dumb oracle she sits, and, like a star,
Shines but on those who look on her afar.

CLXXXVII.

Now of heaven's azure sea the western bay
Began to heave with ripples of pure gold,
O'er which the bright-keeled argosy of day
Came proudly on, its venturous voyage told.
'Twixt plain and hill a deepening shadow lay ;
The far-off summits changed from soft to bold ;
All that the sun had traversed, to the eye
Shone clear, like life's past deeds, just ere we die.

CLXXXVIII.

And, with the waning of the sultry glare,
About the camp a fitful movement grew.
Here, these prepared the evening meal, and there,
From bellied vats those beaded beakers drew.
Others with busy brows and muscles bare
Rubbed their accoutrements to flashing hue.
Some sang ; and oft, a solitary neigh
Shivered the air, then eddying died away.

CLXXXIX.

Scarce a good bowshot from the bustling throng,
A farmstead stood, irregularly built,
Its walls of unhewn stone, yet square and strong,
Held in old days by arquebuse and hilt.
Alone of all the tenements along
Those sparse-clad heights by sunset softly gilt,
Nor strident voice nor desecrating hoof
Filled the apt shelter of its ample roof.

CXC.

But if a curious eye had cared to scan
Its hidden life, two forms might now be seen,
Busy within ; a godlike-statured man,
And grave-browed maiden, moulded like a queen :
A type to show what sovereign Nature can,
When stunting progress cometh not between
Her and her handiwork ; a shape unmarred
As, goddess-born, e'er fired the Scian bard.

CXCI.

And like a queen of eld, her fingers fair
Played busily with stuffs of various dyes,
Red, white, and green, of which, with loving care,
She made, when shaped to strips of equal size,
A banner, such as Freedom's champions bear ;
While Gilbert watched her with unmoving eyes,
Propped 'gainst the threshold, and with absent hands
Smoothed a rough stake, mute slave of her commands.

CXCII.

"'Tis done," she said, and as she said she rose.
"Now to the staff affix me Italy's flag !
As veers the vane unto the wind that blows,
So, once breeze-fluttered, never shall it lag
Behind the storm that breaks upon our foes,
Lead where it will, and though to death it drag !
Follow this symbol, Gilbert ! you will find
Peril in front, but victory hard behind !"

CXCIII.

The colours from her fair brave hands he took,
But quick the fair brave hands themselves he pressed,
Drawing them upwards, and with touch that shook,
Laid and soft held them 'gainst his ample chest.
And as some acorned oak bends low to look
On tender fern that girds its rugged breast,
So he, now bending her green form above,
Dropped in her lap the autumn of his love.

CXCIV.

"Yes, Miriam ! to its flagstaff will I bind
Your banner fast, and follow it as true
As watching vane obeys the wandering wind !
But when our blades have hewn a pathway through
To Rome or Death, then should I chance to find
The better doom, oh ! unto me will you
Be as this beautiful pennon to its pole,
To bark its sail, unto the flesh its soul ?

CXC.V.

“You, Miriam, you ! my standard, symbol be,
And I could bear you through a cloud of foes !
The glorious colours you, upborne by me,
From battle’s onset unto victory’s close.”
Then, holding flag and staff asunder, “See,
What soul or spell hath this apart from those ?
But knit them close, and then, its flag unfurled,
E’en this sere branch might rouse a slumbering world !

CXC.VI.

“And yet a humbler, happier fate I crave,
Than to renew such task as brings us here.
Once let yon sky no longer roof a slave
In this fair land, and I our bark would steer
Back o’er that blue and syren-rippled wave,
To me through you, to you through kinship dear,
And, fondly tethered to its narrow isle,
Live in the sunshine of your wifely smile.”

CXC.VII.

She started at the words, and from his grasp,
Hereto endured, had fain her form withdrawn,
But that he gripped her wrists with tightening clasp,
And to her, helpless as some poor meshed fawn,
Sued with yet bolder lips and quickening gasp :
“Stay near me still, even as to night the dawn !
Fair life, fair love, with no dread gloom o’ercast,
Wherein I drown the darkness of my past !

CXCVIII.

“Thy land, thy race, is mine, and thy young hopes
Are round my heart entwined, as a fair flower
Scales with its delicate bine and tendrilled ropes
The lonely gaps of some untenanted tower,
Where the bat burrows and the night-owl mopes.
O, be to me a beauty and a dower !
Fill me with light and colour, till men bless
Me, the poor wall, that props thy loveliness.

CXCIX.

“Dead in the grave she lies, dead in the grave,
Who should have loved me, but she loved me not.
Pierced through the heart by passion’s glittering glaive,
Thus did she leave me, who were best forgot.
Snowdrops and lilies her lone sepulchre pave,
White as the sheets over some infant’s cot,
Where innocence lies sleeping. She too sleeps ;—
Happier than one that wakes, and wants, and weeps.

CC.

“I would not wake her, for she was not mine.
Sound be her sleep and sweet ; sweet be her dreams !
She will not dream of me. She was divine,
And I am earthly ; so at least it seems.
Yet did she pour out all my life like wine,
And leave the goblet empty. O for streams,
Streams of full love that to the heart are wed,
As some deep river to its deeper bed !

CCI.

“That is not Love which is not loved : ’tis nought
But vacancy of pain, unfuelled fire,
A sigh by silence choked, a speechless thought,
Insanity of soul, diseased desire.
And love is won no more than sold or bought ;
’Tis a spontaneous giver, whom inspire
The Gods alone, whose promptings we forsook.
The fault was mine. She gave me—what I took.

CCII.

“Perchance I speak a mystery ; but with more
I must not violate thine ears. Yet, oh !
If I should reach the heaven where my hopes soar,
All that thou wouldst, then, Miriam, shalt thou know.
Into thy soul I all my soul will pour,
As into ocean swollen rivers flow,
Whose streams withal diminish not, but still,
As on they roll, fresh far-off waters fill.

CCIII.

“Streams roll not back, nor deem that I e’er could
To that dim past revert which was my bane.
I am as one who quits a darksome wood,
And sees before him sunlight-smiling plain,
Thankful to stand no more where late he stood.
Country and kin to me were symbols vain.
Thou art my kindred, and thy land shall be
Land of my love and true nativity.

CCIV.

“But”—and yet tighter, as he spoke, he clenched
His nervous grasp—“by the Enduring Powers,
By all the tears that ever drowned and drenched
The cheeks of hopeless love through lonely hours,
Whose parching fires can by no tears be quenched,
By thy sire’s ashes, by the sacred flowers
That roof thy mother’s grave, I thee conjure,
Spare me not now ! Strike home ; I will endure.

CCV.

“Strike, but once only ! I can nurse that pain ;
Nurse it in solitude which doth repair
Even worse wounds than that. But there’s a chain
No mortal twice consentingly would bear,—
The chain which binds with its tormenting strain
Two pulsing lives that one life do not share.
Love me with love that knows nor ebb nor flow,
As I love thee ! or, Miriam, bid me go !”

CCVI.

Thereat he loosed her hands, and his own fell,
Mute, to his side ; and like some giant stone,
Poised on its base by old enchanter’s spell,
So that it rocks e’en to a touch alone,
So now he stood, mightily movable,
And through the glamour that is all love’s own,
Spite his strong manhood, ready to be stirred
By the soft touch of her responsive word.

CCVII.

A moment mute remained she, with her head
Bent on its stem, like some dark crimson rose
When winds have been too rough, which, since, have fled.
But soon, like bud that to the sunlight blows,
Her face she lifted to his gaze, and said,
“Did he not tell thee? For indeed he knows.
He wrung my secret from me on the day
Our joyous war-bark bounded o’er the bay.”

CCVIII.

“What!” he exclaimed, as future, present, past,
Confusedly before him ’gan to swim;
“What! Godfrid! Comes he then once more to blast
My hopes of heaven? Oh! how love’s sight is dim!”
“O, thou mistak’st me quite!” she cried, aghast;
“For thee he pleaded, and I answered him,
Straight from my soul, as now I answer thee:—
Love me, and I will listen,—when Rome is free!

CCIX.

“Till then,—but hark!” And ere one grateful word
Could from his bosom burst to ease his joy,
Out through the threshold, like a startled bird,
She flew, he following like an eager boy.
And lo! the camp with some strange news was stirred,
And, as a flock of wild-fowl to decoy,
Skimming the reedy pool, are blindly urged
On instant wing, towards one point converged.

CCX.

Thither, too, Miriam, Gilbert at her side,
 Straight made with breathless eagerness her way,
 The rush of supple striplings opening wide
 To let them pass athwart the armed array.
 "'Tis the brave band returned from Rome," one cried.
 "Then Godfrid's back!" and he could hear her say,
 With murmuring lips, as low as breathing shell,
 The rapid prayer, "Pray Heaven! alive and well!"

CCXI.

Soon were all doubts dispelled; for towards the crest
 Of the steep range whose face towards Rome is set,
 A handful stood, by thirsty march distressed,
 Hot, haggard, silent, dashed with gore and sweat;
 And in their midst, towering o'er all the rest,
 As 'mong tall fir-trees tall pine tops them yet,
 Stood Godfrid, gloomy, dark with dust and smoke,
 And to the gathering crowd thus curtly spoke:—

CCXII.

"Yes, we are back, or those at least you see,
 A remnant, safe; the best are left behind:
 Of freedom reft that others might be free,
 Or dead, that worse than dead fresh life might find.
 Cairolì fell o'erborne, one against three,
 But not till two of three first fed the wind.
 His Spartan dam may smile; one son remains;
 Not here,—but wounded, captive, and in chains.

CCXIII.

“What did I hear you ask? Does Rome not rise?
Who rises with the heel upon his neck,
Or greets the dawn with joyfulness, whose eyes,
Long shorn of sight, the greedy vultures peck?
Alas! Of heaven-fed Freedom’s lusty cries,
What can emasculated serflings reckon?
Rome rise? Yes,—when you raise her. Not till then.
Shall she long wait you? Not if ye are men!”

CCXIV.

With which, the keen-eared group aside he ploughed,
And, greeting Miriam with fraternal speech,
Passed, linked with her and Gilbert, from the crowd
To that lone dwelling placed beyond the reach
Of the camp’s tumult. Then, like storm-charged cloud,
The black news circled, each one questioning each,
And vowing deep, as swift the story spread,
To rouse the living and avenge the dead.

CCXV.

So night stole gloomily upon the camp,
Muffling the voice of day; save where anon
The faithful sentinel’s recurrent tramp
Fretted the silent air. No fair moon shone,
Nor mute attendant stars. The night-dews damp
Drenched sleep-laid locks, with no soft shrouds to don;
Thankful in turf-smoothed mound and stone to press
A witching pillow for their weariness.

CCXVI.

They sleep ; they dream ; they will awake. But oh !
How many folded here 'neath slumber's wing,
Whose streams of life now darkly-silent flow,
Filtered through dreams to bright awakening,
Will e'er again this sweetening lethe know,
This subterranean plunge whence newly spring
Health's sparkling currents, every thirst to slake ?
Ah ! they will sleep once more, but not to wake !

CCXVII.

Deep, dark, unending slumber will be theirs,
Whereto there comes no dawn nor pipe of birds,
No smell of green buds bursting unawares,
Nor milk-sweet breath of dewy-ankled herds.
For them mute death the ebon couch prepares ;
For them the Fates chant low the fatal words.
They will awake, to die ! Why cannot sleep
Locked in its arms their souls for ever keep ?

CCXVIII.

Lo ! they awake, they rise, and spring as light
From their rough beds as hare from grassy seat ;
Hailing the spears of dawn, while routed night
Flings out a mist to cover her retreat.
But vain her tardy subterfuge of flight,
Pursuer than pursued is yet more fleet ;
And, her limp shivering banners seized and furled,
Day reigns, unchallenged, o'er a glittering world !

CCXIX.

Then quick the martial heights and slopes began
To prick and burgeon into armed life ;
The dense red ranks spread out like gaudy fan,
To bass-toned drum and treble-fluted fife.
From mouth to mouth the gladsome rumour ran,
The hour was here to kiss the lips of strife,
With battle's breast to blend embrace and breath,
And leap, delirious, into Rome or Death !

CCXX.

Thus straight towards Rome their frowning crests were set,
Just as storm-freighted thundercloud will first
Roll wide its waves of universal threat,
Then blacken towards the point where it must burst ;
And, like a land the fickle rains forget,
Crumbling and fissured with still deepening thirst,
Rome arid lay, longing to hear the brawl
Break overhead, and feel the black drops fall.

CCXXI.

But as they gazed, and every bosom rose,
High-leavened with the thought of combat nigh,
Far off they saw, as when a ground-mist grows,
Or distant copse shows feathery to the eye
When first the early-budding sallow blows,
About the walls a haze ambiguous lie,
Which, when it once had shape and substance ta'en,
Rolled itself out, and crept along the plain.

CCXXII.

Shortly the moving mist began to gleam
And glitter, as when tips of orient rays
Glint on the ripples of a shadeless stream,
Until it glowed one scintillating blaze,
Flickering and flashing in each morning beam.
And then they knew it was no vaporous haze,
But foe come forth,—bayonet, and blade, and gun,—
Shimmering and glancing in the broadening sun.

CCXXIII.

Swift through their lines a thrill electric ran,
And, as it died, girt by that faithful few
Whose spendthrift lives had still been in the van
Since first his banner of redemption flew,
'Midst men heroic looking more than man,
Serenely strong, the Chief came full in view ;
While through the ranks, with sabre-sounding clang,
A shout of welcome and defiance rang.

CCXXIV.

“Hail, noble champions of a noble Cause !”
Flashing them back their greeting, thus he spake.
“See, Fortune smiles. The beast whose greedy claws
Ye have come to clip, doth from his covert break,
And, spurred by desperate terror, hither draws.
Now in your hands your shafts avenging take,
And bide his onset ! We will wait him here,
And let the rash fool rush upon the spear.

CCXXV.

“Then shall his lair be yours. Gods ! what a lair !
The very cradle of your name and race ;
To Roman loins where Sabine women bare
A lusty birth from violent embrace :
Sons sternly strong, daughters divinely fair,
Celestial those in force as these in face,
Who, not unmindful of their getting, curled
Their sinewy arms around a ravished world !

CCXXVI.

“What ! do ye vaunt their blood still warms your veins ?
Are ye the lineage of that splendid rape ?
Then, of the world they won ye, what remains,
From Parthia’s plains to Calpe’s final Cape ?
O’er your sires’ empire who is he that reigns ?
Where is their sceptre, if ye boast their shape ?
What, of the wide inheritance their zone
Of conquest girdled, do ye call your own ?

CCXXVII.

“Look ! where your sires, disarmed by love’s decree,
To their consenting brides at length were wed,
The Gallic harlot, fetched across the sea,
With venal limbs fouls your ancestral bed !
Your home, your hearth, your very nursery,
Where Roman babes on Roman tales were fed,
Hath grown a den defiled, a place of shame,
Barbarians mock, and patriots blush to name !

CCXXVIII.

“Where trod the Jove-crowned conquerors of earth,
The stealthy shaveling slipshod creeps along ;
Where rang the echoes of triumphant mirth,
The trembling monk mumbles his drowsy song.
On the twin hill where Empire took its birth,
And the victorious eagles used to throng,
A spurious Cæsar drills his legions foul,
And flings his ægis o’er each crouching cowl !

CCXXIX.

“And do ye live and breathe? Now live no more,
Save ye can purge the palace and the fane
Of prince and priest who barter grace ’gainst gore,
And God’s and Cæsar’s name alike profane.
Is Italy so fair, their native shore
Bounds their barbarian appetite in vain?
Vainly the Alps arise, vain rolls the wave?
Then sate their greed of soil.—Give them a grave !”

CCXXX.

Then with brief words, and indicating hand,
Along the heights and broken slopes he spread
The little cohorts of his clustered band.
Some in the shrunken streamlet’s stony bed
He showed to crouch, and others bade to stand
Behind the waving ridge’s sheltering head,
Watching, with eye alert and firelock low,
To deal prompt death on the presumptuous foe.

CCXXXI.

For those, in loose sporadic order ranged,
Cover he found in vineyards densely green,
As with the wand of conjuring Mars he changed
To panoply of war their peaceful screen,
From its sweet pristine purposes estranged.
Terraced and sloped to be the fruitful scene
Of happy toil, behold it frowning fort,
And cruel jungle for man's tigerish sport !

CCXXXII.

And where the gray-trunked olive's purpling beads
Glistened among its shifting-coloured sprays,
He dotted children of the mountain-meads,
Who mark the chamois with unerring gaze
On track that only to the snow-line leads ;
While others in the down-cut corn and maize,
Cut but unstacked, he bade in ambush wait,
Patient as vengeance, pitiless as fate !

CCXXXIII.

Ah ! thus this fair and frolic world, whose lap
Teems and runs o'er with oil, and corn, and wine,
Whose veins, for ever young, the generous sap
Of Plenty, stored in life's mysterious mine,
Still mounts, can human madness and mishap
Drench with salt tears more barren than the brine ;
Where love and song should wreath their brow with flowers,
Thus rage and anguish fill the hateful hours.

CCXXXIV.

Hark ! the sharp challenge of a rifle rings
Shrill through the air ! then all again is still ;
Save where its eddying echo faintly clings
To the deep hollows of some distant hill.
But soon the breeze a fuller message brings,
Another,—and another yet,—until
A fitful musket-rattle spreads around,
And silence seems but waiting upon sound.

CCXXXV.

Awhile from hill and slope no answer came ;
Though many a sharp-fanged messenger of death
Tore through the leafy vine-stem's tender frame,
Scorched the gray trunks with its malignant breath,
And set the shocks of ripened maize aflame.
But as when long a storm-cloud lingereth,
And, since it loometh black, men wonder why
Its earth-aimed javelins linger in the sky,

CCXXXVI.

But when at length it bursteth overhead,
It bursteth all at once, and serried hail
Flashes and rattles on the torrent's bed,
And lays the corn, flat as the thresher's flail ;
So now, at lagging signal swiftly spread,
The scowling muzzles pointing towards the vale
Hurled on the foe a hurricane of steel,
That made the foremost fall, the hindmost reel.

CCXXXVII.

Not all the spendthrift missiles of attack
Had from resistance torn one rood away,
Though trampling death had roughly scored his track
With many a maiden's joy and mother's stay.
Some gazed at heaven with sightless orbs, alack !
Some, as asleep, among the vine-leaves lay ;
And some were prone, with faces to the earth,
Hiding from sight their darkness and their dearth.

CCXXXVIII.

“ Now must be craven bolts, winged from afar,
Exchanged for bristling weapons, face to face,
And this too distant dalliance of war
Discarded for the grip of close embrace.
So, Latin lads ! show of what strain ye are,
And prove the unslacked mettle of your race
Against these mongrels of a lineage lewd,
The bastard sons of sires your sires subdued ! ”

CCXXXIX.

Thus through the hush of momentary truce
Rang the Chief's clarion voice. But from his lips
Scarce had the words been fledged, than, as a sluice
Opens and quick its pent-up water slips,
Was all the volume of assault let loose,
And, wave on wave, the flashing bayonet-tips
Came streaming on, an ever-broadening ring,
Crested with banners of the Pontiff-King.

CCXL.

Wave upon wave : As, when on some long shore
The tide comes rolling in, in ridgy sheets,
Surge after surge, with hollow-bosomed roar,
Plunges and breaks, then hurriedly retreats,
And the stunned strand stands solid as before,
But swift a fresh on-coming billow meets
The flying foam, and carries it along,
Back to the assault, with volume doubly strong ;

CCXLI.

So, endless, rolled the ridges of attack,
Line after line, valour at valour's heel ;
Surged, roared, rushed, broke, then fell in fragments back,
Shattered and shivered 'gainst that shore of steel.
Yet waxed not then the tide of onset slack,
But as each ruined rank was seen to reel,
Another,—longer,—stronger,—onwards dashed,
And o'er the flying eddies curled and crashed.

CCXLII.

Thus, for as long as draws the mistress moon
The waters of the deep one way, the tide
Of fury that had first set in at noon
Flowed onwards, till, though full, 'twas still defied,
Nor for a while or gained or ebb'd. But soon
The sea of utmost ardour 'gan subside ;
The living waves waxed fainter and more few,
And from the beach, discomfited, withdrew.

CCXLIII.

Then forth from copse and vineyard, orchard, grove,
Farmstead and stony torrent's shielding bank,
And deep-set pools where the tall cane-stems wove
For ambushed feet a cover dense and dank,
Rushing and trampling came a mighty drove,
That swiftly formed in many a hornéd rank,
And swarming on each open crest and crown,
Paused for the word, should launch their limbs adown.

CCXLIV.

Full on the right of the embattled host,
Glimmered the generous blades that, flasht betimes,
First hewed a path to freedom :—Savoy's boast,
That hardy race, strung by subalpine rimes ;
With sea-bronzed breasts from curved Liguria's coast,
Lithe Lombard striplings tall as unpolled limes,
And high-browed sons of Venice, come to spread
The spell which, yestreen, raised her from the dead.

CCXLV.

In close array, upon the left, was packed
The South's volcanic valour ; Ætna's stock,
Ready to roll, a fiery cataract,
Down the hillside ; Vesuvius' dark-eyed flock,
That in the blackness of the night had hacked
From their own limbs the fetter's cankerous lock ;
And grave-faced exiles from great Rome itself,
Who still had scorned to share submission's pelf.

CCXLVI.

Full in the centre of the bright array,
The kernel of its courage, clustered those
Who sleepless watched the lifting lids of day,
And leaped to arms as Freedom's orient rose :
The gashed survivors of Marsala's fray,
Who fed Volturno's vultures with their foes ;
And those who sware Marsala's well-kept vow,
A thousand falchions then,—a handful now.

CCXLVII.

Here, mute as moulded marble, Godfrid stood,
With heart as quiet, and with hands as still,
As when the beaters flush some well-stocked wood,
Or drive wild wings upon the heathered hill.
Nigh him stood Gilbert, like in hardihood,
But who, with pulses bubbling like a rill,
Close as a shadow kept by Miriam's side,
And tightly grasped a banner triple-dyed.

CCXLVIII.

As when you saw her first among the vines,
Singing a hymn to Freedom, see her now,
Her dark eyes shining as the night-star shines,
And, bare, her black hair rippling from her brow !
Her crimson kirtle fell in martial lines
To her firm feet ; and as round some full prow
The foam-pleats white alternate rise and rest,
'Neath snowy folds heaved her heroic breast.

CCXLIX.

But where to bodice and to kirtle bright
Were twined and festooned vine-leaves erst attached,
Now, lashed across the kerchief's spotless white,
A silk green scarf the sister colours matched.
And when the trumpet shrilled for final fight,
From Gilbert's hand the banner quick she snatched,
Flung to the breeze its folds, and as the clang
Of battle-charge began, sonorous sang.

I.

Now by the might of Mavors' line !
Now by the Brothers Twin !
Now by Lucretia's stroke divine,
That quenched the Tarquin's sin !
By the decisive sword of old,
Flung by the haughty Gaul,
When greedy Brennus clutched the gold,
And, weighing, lost it all !
Now by great Scipio's blade that bit
The Afric's breastplate through,
And by Rienzi's torch which lit
Rome's vestal fires anew !
Awake ! Arise ! Lift up your eyes !
And swear, from Alp to sea,
From the bending shore to the crags that soar,
Our Italy, fair Italy,
Shall be one, shall be one and free !

2.

Ho ! Lombard banners, to the fore !
Ho ! Savoy, clinch the rear !
Ho ! Volscian lads that hunt the boar
With never-snapping spear !
Make of your thews a mighty wall,
Like Antium made of yore,
That vain should smite the Libyan squall
Her Fortune-favoured shore !
Ho ! mountain breasts that beard the snows !
Ho ! arms that reave the main !
Ho ! Tuscan hands that pluck the rose,
And reap the yellow grain !
Awake ! Arise ! Lift up your eyes !
And swear, from Alp to sea,
From the bending shore to the crags that soar,
Brave Italy, proud Italy,
Shall be one, shall be one and free !

CCL.

More sang she not, for the soft-closing notes
In the tumultuous air scarce space had found ;
And e'en the chorus, hymned by thousand throats,
Was in the roar of thunderous onset drowned.
No more than voice of agony that floats,
When tempests swoop and winds and seas resound,
From slowly-sinking lips still loth to die,—
Soared their refrain, a muffled, feeble cry.

CCLI.

Not fiercer, blacker, sweeps the Alpine storm,
When gorges howl and the fir-forests crash ;
Not louder, ocean, when the dun waves form
Their monstrous heads, and rocks and breakers clash ;
Not straighter doth the avalanche enorm
Its jagged path through crackling pine-masts gash,
Than swept the impulse of their gathered will,—
At once wind, wave, and lawine,—down the hill.

CCLII.

And like to dense-grown trunks whose hoary tops
Toss, bend, and swing in the distracted air,
When some invisible hand the hollow stops
Of heaven's loud organ opens unaware
And rolls wind-music over wood and copse,
The serried lines, soon as they heard the blare
And felt the breath of that tempestuous shock,
Strenuous as sudden, 'gan to roll and rock.

CCLIII.

And as they rocked, yet fuller waxed the stress
Of the on-sweeping hurricane that bore,
Strong against strength, 'gainst pity pitiless,
Where fierce the stand, fiercer in onset more,
And 'gainst resistance sheer resistlessness ;
Till,—rank behind confused with rank before,
Column with square confounded, van with rear,—
Through the cooped host, fluttered the wings of fear.

CCLIV.

Then as wild coveys, when warm days have gone,
That equinoctial winds have swelled and packed,
Down the dun moor, a cloud of wings, come on,
And, as they flit, upon the heathery tract
And bracken-patches cast a shadow wan,
But when from screening wall have loudly cracked
The sportsmen's barrels, swift the wings divide
And over knoll and scaur fly far and wide ;

CCLV.

So the dense ranks that fenced the Triple Crown,
And, too unmindful of rebuke divine,
Drew Peter's sword afresh, soon as the frown
Of grim assault drew near in line on line
Of smoke and steel, flung blade and rifle down,
And scattering wide o'er dip and steep incline,
Their faces set where safety led the way,
And fled in wildered flakes of loose dismay.

CCLVI.

Then all seemed won ; and victory's course that, first,
Steadied by curbing discipline had rolled,
Soon as it felt resistance' barriers burst,
Asunder swept and spread out uncontrolled ;
Dispersing as the fugitives dispersed,
By the wild rout made hazardously bold,
Till 'mong the exultant lines,—left, centre, right,—
Pursuit had waxed disorderly as flight.

CCLVII.

Yet not one fleeing face was turned to smite
The victor's rashness ; but away, away,
Like to scared cushat chased by ravening kite,
Sped each fleet foot,—fast—faster,—from the fray.
Then rang once more that war-cry of delight,
“Death ! Death or Rome !” throughout the glad array
Of following triumph, whilst the cross-crowned dome,
Glistening afar, seemed to reëcho, “Rome !”

CCLVIII.

When lo ! though nought as yet could they descry
Save friends behind and scudding foes before,
Afresh the bolts of death began to fly,
Burst forth afresh the bellowing cannon's roar.
So thick the steely hail, they scanned the sky
To see if Heaven itself perchance might pour
The hissing missiles down, and foully mar
With unfair stroke the hard-got spoils of war.

CCLIX.

But even while they halted, and with eyes
Of wonder, not of terror, gazed around,
They saw the flying rout melt phantomwise,
And sudden, in its stead, as from the ground,
A new and wide-embattled host arise,
Waving bright banners with the eagle crowned ;
Bristling in arms,—gun, bayonet, sabre, lance,—
The glittering legions of imperious France.

CCLX.

Then rage seized every breast ; and once again,
By warlike instinct ordered, swift they shrank,
Rallying each other both with voice and ken,
Into close file and steady marshalled rank ;
Though faster, thicker, rained upon them then
The lethal hail, and many a brave brow sank,
To rise no more, on whom, a moment gone,
The upward light of dawning victory shone.

CCLXI.

Fagged against fresh, a handful 'gainst a host,
But naked steel now left wherewith to cope
With every bolt that Mars and Vulcan boast,
'Gainst firm-set Fate a feebly desperate hope,
A half-spent tide against an iron coast,
See them once more, as low the sun-rays slope
Athwart their decimated ranks, advance,
And face the unbroken front of towering France.

CCLXII.

What patter of April shower on branch and bud
Is to grim winter's slantly-slashing hail,
What to the snow-swelled torrent's bounding flood
The stinted summer streamlet's loitering tale,
What woodland barrel to the cannon's thud,
What soft south zephyr to antarctic gale,
Was the sharp shower that first their ranks did plough,
Matched with the storm of steel that gashed them now.

CCLXIII.

'Twas as though thousand furnaces of death,
Fledging hot shafts from sulphur-teeming womb,
With inexhaustible volcanic breath
Winged them, unerring messengers of doom !
In vain, as swift as one form tottereth,
Another fills the void ; for it the tomb
Opens, and sucks it down. One more yet wades
These waves of death, then into darkness fades.

CCLXIV.

In vain or force or feint, courage or skill,
Against a foe that seemed to multiply,
By some miraculous arm, its strength at will,
And, scattering death, never itself to die.
Maddened by pain, no more they cared to fill
The widening gaps, but with a desperate cry,
Rushed in disordered valour, singly brave,
If not to make, at least to find a grave.

CCLXV.

And many found, yet not one eager edge
Of all that rushing steel e'er reached the foe ;
But, swept aside, as low wind sweeps the sedge,
Or, when the equinoctial furies blow,
The gulls are beaten back from beetling ledge
Under the shelter of the cliffs below,
Those whom a foiling fate forbade to bite
The welcome dust, were swept away in flight.

CCLXVI.

Ah ! then those fled who never fled before,
And they who would have limb from limb been torn
Sooner than fly, by those, alas ! who wore
Their own proud badge, were backwards pressed and borne ;
Still with their faces to the cannon's roar,
Still with their nostrils breathing martial scorn,
But all as idly as defiant sail
Would beard the storm and ride against the gale.

CCLXVII.

And ever as in scattered rout they fled,
Back o'er the ground they late as victors trod,
The swift-pursuing steel hissed overhead,
And many a lip kissed the ensanguined sod.
And ah ! full many a dying prayer was said,
As took the soul its farewell of the clod,
And deaf though Heaven seemed grown to cries and plaints,
Wild vows were breathed to long-forgotten saints.

CCLXVIII.

Once only did they turn and stand at bay.
'Twas when with eyes of fury they beheld
The pack of Gallic bloodhounds, fresh for fray,
Joined in pursuit, and its fierce music swelled,
By the base mongrels that had slunk away
Scared by their presence, but now yelped and yelled
Louder than all, and strove with fangs unfed
To tear the backs before whose breasts they fled.

CCLXIX.

Then every brow that not in sleep was laid,
And every foot that still could crawl to front,
And every hand that yet could wield a blade,
Wheeled round to stem that sanguinary hunt.
No mouthing cannon lent its strenuous aid ;
Nought had they now but steel whose edge was blunt
With hours of slaughtering, nought but naked arms,
And that fine rage which, even in failure, charms.

CCLXX.

And quickly with their swords they hewed a place
Around a rude low wain, at daybreak filled
With ammunition long since blown to space,
Yoked with two steers ; one in war's shambles killed,
The other still with sleek obedient face
Standing, as though in peaceful furrow stilled
By master gone to take his simple meal,
When the tall church-tower bells at mid-day peal.

CCLXXI.

And black with battle-smoke and splashed with gore,
By one wheel towered Godfrid, and by one,
Gilbert : each faithful to the vow he swore,
That Rome or Death should crown the setting sun.
And like to her, Bellona hight of yore,
Into the wain, carrying the flag she spun,
Lightly leaped Miriam, all its folds unflung,
And o'er the din these sounding curses sung :—

I.

May thine armies be smitten with pallor,
Thy strong places treat with the foe ;
May a by-word be made of thy valour,
Thy glory be blotted like snow !
May the spur of the insolent stranger
Be clanked o'er thy thresholds at night ;
May he make of thy cradles a manger !
May he take in thy beds his delight !
May he drink of thy vintages fairest,
May he feast on thy harvest of years ;
Mayst thou hear, in the hour thou despairest,
His laugh and the clash of his spears !
May thy children the sword he shall leave thee
In scorn, lately laid at his feet,
Snatch, and, cowardly parricides, cleave thee,
And fling thee to jackals to eat !
In the ways of thine infamous city,
May slaughter as traffic be thick,
May revenge wade through blood without pity,
Till slayer with slaying grow sick !
And when carnage is gorged, oh ! then after,
To the demons of fire be it sworn,
That shall rage around roof-tree and rafter,
And leave thee, the loathing and laughter
Of ages unborn !

CCLXXII.

But long before the execrating strain
Thus clashed to close, the many-dinted blades
Had carved a goodly circle round the wain,
And a new batch of miscreants to the shades,
Howling, had sent, whose recreant fellows fain
In flight found safety, like to venturous maids
That follow the retreating sea, but swift
Fly, when the waves afresh their foam-crests lift.

CCLXXIII.

And there, aloft, her banner in her hand,
And all the Furies towering in her eyes,
Upon the wain, electrically grand,
Like unto one sole cloud in thunderous skies
The lurid sunlight smites, did Miriam stand,
Marking the battle-surges fall and rise,
And, 'mid the clash of swords confusedly grouped,
Where Gilbert's flashed, and Godfrid's, poising, swooped.

CCLXXIV.

But soon the doughty arms that thus had gained
From struggle new new strength, were left to waste
Their strokes in air, since for each foot they gained
By prowess, fear their foes a rood displaced.
Then quick the strange miraculous missiles, rained
From weapons such as flesh had never faced
Since valour first was foiled, once more began
To mow them down, van falling after van.

CCLXXV.

Then many fled, and those who fled not fell ;
And, from that moment, Miriam 'mong the erect
Nor Gilbert saw nor Godfrid. 'Mid the swell
And surf of carnage lay their valour wrecked.
And ere she could descend and rush to well
Her love in dying ears,—unruled, unchecked,
The tide of flight came on, and as the spray
Lifts the light seaweed, swept her steps away.

CCLXXVI.

The last she saw was that mute patient steer
Join its yoke-fellow in death's darkened stall,
Where it may slumber peaceful all the year,
Dreading no bondsman's stroke, no master's call.
The rest was like the tumult in the ear
Of waters o'er the drowning, or the pall
That falls on fainting eyes when pulses reel,
And even the living brain forgets to feel.

CCLXXVII.

Down dropped the sun as though ashamed to stay,
And, as he veiled his eyes, above, around,
The welkin blushed the colour of the fray,
Reflecting deep the crimson of the ground.
Then slowly, sadly, died the flush away
On Nature's cheek, in horrent pallor drowned ;
Till even pallor's self no more could bloom,
And o'er her visage crept a hueless gloom.

CCLXXVIII.

But still through gloaming and the deepening dusk,
Incessant skimmed the frantic feet of flight,
As flies the fawn before the wild-boar's tusk,
When hunger sends him raging through the night.
And if they stopped to grope for remnant rusk
Left in their wallets who no more should bite
The sweet fresh bread of home, or stooped to cool
The fire of burning throats in brackish pool ;

CCLXXIX.

Anon the dark-aimed javelins of death
Robbed the poor life they fain had thought to ease,
Or spurred afresh their still sore-panting breath.
And as one hears a ghost on every breeze,
When betwixt midnight tombs one hasteneth,
So did their fearful fancy picture trees,
Ruin, and rock, another,—final,—host,
To speed their steps to Pluto's gloomy coast.

CCLXXX.

Into sparse wattled sheep-pens many crept,
And by the rude but pitying herd were hid
Among his flock, that, all inhuman, slept.
But their bed-fellows closed not weary lid,
And when pursuit's fierce waves had past them swept,
Up from the strange, warm, throbbing couch they slid,
And to their host, beneath the starlight pale,
'Mid sobs of fury stammered out their tale.

CCLXXXI.

They told him how the day dawned flushed with hope,
How noon had seen the hirelings' onset foiled,
How they, triumphant, bounded down the slope,
And then,—with lips that faltered, blood that boiled,—
How their spent strength had with new foes to cope,
And Italy's dream, touching its goal, was spoiled !
Then, speech engulfed in surges of the breast,
Aghast they stood, and, silent, looked the rest !

CCLXXXII.

Till one just mustered stertorous breath to tell
The shepherd son of Romulus who those were
That with their hellish sorcery broke the spell.
Whereat the hind shook his black matted hair,
Unto their curses joined his curses fell ;
And bringing down his crook, high poised in air,
Sharp 'gainst the ground, as though it were a spear,
Called on the avenging gods below to hear !

CCLXXXIII.

But long ere timid stars stole forth to peer
Through latticed heaven on what the day had done,
Monte Rotondo saw gaunt forms of fear
Pour in, and through her streets unhalting run.
A haggard troop, pale, footsore, nerveless, sere,
Oh ! how unlike those heralds of the sun,
Who, ripe for victory, with feet elate
Had carried fire and freedom through her gate !

CCLXXXIV.

Into Mentana's squalid ways,—for there
A little band, at daybreak left behind,
Still kept unbroken front,—the wounded bare
The dying, fain some pillow's prop to find
For these, oblivious of their own despair.
And soon its church with pallets rude was lined,
'Mong which true priests of God soft-sandalled stole,
To speed with patriot prayers each parting soul.

CCLXXXV.

Just as the twilight swooned to lid-closed dark,
A stir was heard without ; and striplings four,
Whose breasts had 'scaped the foeman's deadly mark,
Into the nave a goodly body bore,
Stretched on a litter, seeming stiff and stark,
Whose torn red shirt was steeped in redder gore,
And to whose beard and hair of iron gray
The death-dews clung, like silvery mist to spray.

CCLXXXVI.

Behind them, close walked Miriam, on whose brow
Black thunder-sorrow brooded, but who dropped
No tear of feeble anguish even now.
Slow at the sight each prostrate sufferer propped
His head upon his hand, and breathed a vow
Of dying love towards her. She nor stopped,
Nor looked on either side, but followed pale
The mournful convoy to the altar rail.

CCLXXXVII.

There with arresting hand she bade them pause,
And on the altar steps to lay him down,
And to a servant of dear Christ's sweet laws
Who wore the saintly Francis' habit brown,
Beckoned ; and as distressful beauty draws
Even the heart that wears the chaste cold crown,
He hastened towards her and said lovingly,
"My daughter dear, what can I do for thee?"

CCLXXXVIII.

"Wed me," she said, "dear father, to this man ;
Wed me this hour, ere he be man no more !
See ! though his eyes be closed, his cheeks be wan,
And though he soon will tread the heavenly floor,
He lives—he breathes ! his sinking bosom can Receive the vows I long therein to pour,
Ere he shall leave me but a deaf-eared clod,
And go to claim me at the Throne of God !"

CCLXXXIX.

The monk bent over the mute, hueless face,
And laid his ear against the blood-stained breast ;
Then turned to her, and said : "Fair child of grace,
'Tis true that life hath not yet left its nest,
But even now for its true dwelling-place
Its wings it lifts, to fly away to rest.
'Twould be as though thou wedd'st a corpse, to wear
Eternal widowhood on thy young hair."

CCXC.

“O yes, I know!” she only could repeat,
In words that choking burst through sorrow’s dam,
“Father, I know! But wed us, I entreat,
That I may plead, through him, before the Lamb,
For our wronged land! It, corpse-like at my feet,
I ne’er can be more widowed than I am!
I,—I will live to plot, he die to pray,
That Heaven and Earth conjoined avenge this day!”

CCXCI.

The trembling friar took up the clammy hand,
Whose pulse beat faint, and laid it within hers,
While she repeated, at his grave command,
The solemn pledge which deathless bond avers.
And, on the instant,—o’er a silent land
As a faint breeze sometimes in summer stirs,
Then drops,—so Gilbert, for a moment’s space,
Opened blue eyes, and smiled into her face.

CCXCII.

Then grief had all its way, and wild she flung
Her body on his body, and loud wept;—
Wept with the loosened nerves, late overstrung,
And with the passion that too long had slept.
A sympathetic horror stole among
The close-packed pallets: some from out them crept,
Near her to kneel; and those who could not stir,
Died, weeping blood for Italy and her!

CCXCIII.

Stupendous Power ! That, secret and afar,
Sitt'st on Thy throne, where none may come to Thee,
Oh ! fling the gates of hidden Heaven ajar,
That, for one moment, suffering flesh may see
Thy face, and what Thy darkened judgments are !
Are war, and sin, and sorrow, Thy decree ?
Is Fate our Father ? Thou art supremely strong,
And we, so weak ! How long, O Lord ! how long ?

CCXCIV.

Now far and wide the sterile-rolling plain
Lay in the shadow of the passing Night,
Whose ebon wings, outstretched o'er land and main,
Move on,—slow,—silent,—none may mark their flight !
O'er stiff cold limbs for ever dead to pain,
O'er writhing forms whose cries still scared the kite,
Calling for aid from those that, happier, slept,
On, on, unhalting, pitiless, she swept.

CCXCV.

There is a tall but crumbling tower that stands
Amid the lone Campagna's gloomiest waste,
Whose depths were dug by those Cyclopean hands
Which famed Cortona's massive circuit traced.
Above, its walls, like wrecks on littered strands,
Heaped more than built, rise up. Each age has traced
Its record on the masonry. Wouldst compare
Republic, Empire, ruin ?—Scan them there !

CCXCVI.

Its corner-stones are waifs from drown'd fanes,
Its mortar, marble gods. Urn, statue, bust,
All that of porphyry temples yet remains,
Tumbled and trampled, shattered, ground to dust,
Chipped, splintered, fouled, besmeared with wintry stains,
Into its chinks and crannies have been thrust.
Religions, dynasties, to patch a rent
In its rude mail, their sepulchres have lent.

CCXCVII.

The feudal bandit, 'scaping from the proof
Of bloody deed,—a later, fiercer Goth,—
Oft to its shelter fled with glowing hoof,
There fortress found, and braved a Pontiff's wrath.
Foxes and wolves have littered 'neath its roof.
But now alone, to sup his darnel broth,
And warm his agued limbs within its walls,
Thither at times the stricken shepherd crawls.

CCXCVIII.

To-night there shone a feeble light within,
And, in the one sole chamber time had spared,
Upon a pallet rough and mattress thin,
Was stretched a wounded man. His throat was bared,
But o'er his still-clad form was thrown a skin
Such as Rome's minstrels wear,—rude, shaggy-haired,—
That served for coverlet; and 'neath his head,
A sheaf of straw for pillow had been spread.

CCXCIX.

Soundly he slept, though ever and anon,
As though he would awake, he groaned and gasped ;
But still a stout sword-hilt, from which was gone
One-half its blade, his right hand tightly grasped.
A little way aloof, her knees upon,
With eyes upraised and palms intently clasped
Before a crucifix, herself had laid
Against the wall, a white-cowled Sister prayed.

CCC.

And save these two, for many a league around,
No living mortal was : only the dead.
He, pierced and gashed, and plunged in sleep profound,
She, with her pure white veil around her head,
Between her God divided and each sound
That reached her from the slumbering sufferer's bed :
Her vigil's sole companion, one small lamp,
Such as you find in sepulchres old and damp.

CCCI.

Sudden he woke, and with a battle-cry
Raising his body upright in the bed,
He brandished swift the shivered blade on high,
Struck at the foe, and rallied friends that fled
He saw as yet with but half-waking eye,
And, bridging the abyss between the dread
Dark hour he fell and life's returning light,
Fancied himself still lost in thick of fight.

CCCH.

But when the air resisted not, nor stroke
Of quick-retorting sword attested fray,
Slowly to full-dawned consciousness he woke,
Stared weirdly round, and wondered where he lay.
He saw the bare blank walls, the nun's dark cloak,
The little oil-fed lamp's ascetic ray ;
Then on his bootless hilt and bloody vest
Looking,—half he recalled, and read the rest.

CCCHH.

The pale-faced Sister, startled by his cries
'Mid her mute prayers, had risen from her knees,
And, with celestial pity in her eyes,
Stole towards the pallet, soft as steals a breeze
Through open casements just as sunset dies.
“Brother,” she said, “I come to bring you ease,
To nurse your wounds and prop your tottering soul.
The fight forget : 'tis Heaven is now your goal.”

CCCHV.

Her eyes were cast down meekly, and she seemed
As one who saw yet saw not. On her brow
And round her lips a tranquil radiance beamed.
Yet surely, surely not again, not now,
Not now,—as but a moment gone,—he dreamed
An empty dream? That face, that voice, avow
Herself, her soul! “Olympia!” loud he cried ;
But on his lips all other language died.

CCCv.

She started, and flung up her arms, like one
By bullet through the brain in battle shot,
Or fearful tidings suddenly undone.
“O Godfrid! Godfrid! Tell me it is not,
Not thou, not Godfrid! whom at rise of sun,
At noon, at night, I never have forgot
In my poor prayers! not thou, the once adored,
I see with shattered, sacrilegious sword!

CCCvI.

“Ah! yes, 'tis thou, sole vision of my heart,
Ere dearer Christ espoused me to His breast!
I must behold thee, even as thou art,—
His foe, His executioner confessed,
Stained with His blood. When we were forced to part
On that smooth shore by smoother sea caressed,
How could I dream that we should meet as now,
A worse than brand of Cain upon thy brow!

CCCvII.

“Did all avail thee nothing? Not the morn
When first we met, and thou with gracious speech
Dissevered'st from the stream-washed blossoming thorn
The snow-white branch, I, feeble, could not reach?
Oh! didst thou ne'er recall, in hours forlorn,
The sunny shrine I tended on the beach,
Nor that all-trustful tenderness, which made
Thine alien presence welcome as I prayed?

CCCVIII.

“ Didst thou forget my little chapel quite?
And did Madonna’s statue, which thy hand
Helped me to deck, as swiftly fade from sight
As morning’s footsteps from the evening’s sand?
Didst never, never, think thee of that night
Of raging tempest on a blackened strand,
When thou didst seek my face, and I did weep
To hear thy woe, then, blessing, bade thee sleep?

CCCIX.

“ Hide, hide that sword from sight ! It pierces through
This heart of mine, I deemed could bleed no more.
Oh ! how couldst thou that very hand imbrue
In Peter’s blood, which, on the shining shore,
’Twixt the gray mountains and the waters blue,
I linked with mine,—so, never linked before,
Or since,—when we together vowed our feet
Unto that pilgrimage, though vain, how sweet !

CCCX.

“ How often ! oh how often ! in the hush
Of solitary night, when spite of prayer
And kind Madonna’s help the tears would gush
From my weak breast, I stifled my despair,
And from my cheeks the rolling drops would brush,
Hugging the hope that from thy memory ne’er
That pilgrimage would pass, but every scene
Would in thy heart remain for ever green !

CCCXI.

“Thou hast forgot all,—all ! Our journey dear,
Our simple mid-day meal, our evening halt,
The tumbling cataracts, the sheep-bells clear,
The tall black pine-woods scaling Heaven’s vault,—
Tell me how soon did these all disappear,
How soon didst sow thy memory with salt ?
When, when did cold oblivion begin ?
And when was all as though it ne’er had been ?

CCCXII.

“Well might my prayers, sin-weighted as they be,
Not reach the Throne of Grace. But thou, O thou !
Thou mightst at least have not been deaf to me,
And, for my sake, have revered the brow,
Mangled with thorns, of Him who died for thee !
Though thou believ’st not, was it hard to bow
To the remembrance of the words I spoke,
The tears I shed, the hoping heart you broke ?

CCCXIII.

“No ! all was vain. Shore, mountain, sea, and stream,
Milan’s cathedral, Spiaggiascura’s shrine,
The silent grief that worse than speech did seem,
To me so sacred, since it half was thine,
Then when we parted,—these were but a dream !
Alas ! I dream not. Waking woe is mine,
Waking reproach. Forgive, O loving Lord !
That I once kissed the hand that grasps that sword !”

CCCXIV.

Thus as she spake, he neither word nor sign
Let 'scape, nor muscle moved, nor eyelid dropped,
But, with lips parted, gaze slow-dimmed with brine,
Intently gazed and listened, till she stopped.
Then, one hand still to hilt he held divine
Clinging, his head upon the other propped,
Grave, he began : " With reverence hast not thou
Been heard, Olympia? Reverent, hear me now !

CCCXV.

" Deep in my heart thy sainted image lies,
And unforgotten, unforsworn has dwelt,
Undimmed, unchanged through change of time and skies,
The one sole memory just as keenly felt
Now, as when first thy presence woke my sighs !
Nay, start not ! shrink not ! Though my soul should melt
In burning lava o'er thee,—not again,
Deem, I would fire the breast fired vainly then.

CCCXVI.

" Thou art the bride of Heaven, and I, alas !
Earthy ; but, even as thou art heavenly, hear !
Oh ! since that bitter parting came to pass,
Never an hour has been, in year on year,
Whether the hills were hoar, or green the grass,
Or dimpling corn uplifted playful spear,
Or mellow bunches drooped from branch and wall,
I had not sped to thee, hadst thou deigned to call.

CCCXVII.

“Forgot that morn ! forgot that dewy spot,
Where Heaven, it seemed, dawned full upon my gaze !
Forgot the little chapel ! and forgot
Madonna’s statue, at whose flowery base
With thee I knelt, my doubts remembered not !
Oh ! if oblivion from my brain shall raze
Record of these, then back may Mercy roll
Her opening gates, and clang them on my soul !

CCCXVIII.

“Nay ! bear with me, Olympia, to the end !
Full well I know ’tis not thy love, thy wrongs,
With which thou dost reproach me, or that rend
The heart which henceforth but to God belongs.
Vainly I now should call thee more than friend ;
Vainly, though every dear old feeling throngs
Back to my breast at sight of thee once more :
Vainly,—though e’en I knelt and could adore !

CCCXIX.

“Too late ! Too late ! Denied to me awhile,
For ever art thou ravished from me now !
Gone from thy lips the sweetly mortal smile,
And Heaven’s pure snows defend thy sacred brow.
Thou art removed so far, thou wouldst beguile
My wildest vows, as did that virgin bough
Thy straining hands, when in the mountain glade
I lent my help ! . . Alas ! Me none will aid !

CCCXX.

“ Yet though thou didst abjure me, and hast given
Heaven all the love I once with Heaven could share,
The links which knitted me to thee, are riven
Tighter by time, and have survived despair.
I may from many sins need to be shriven ;
But one weight still I shall not have to bear
Before the judgment-seat. My love was pure,
Even as thine own, and will till death endure !

CCCXXI.

“ I do upbraid thee not. Mayhap thou hast
Reserved a quiet cloister in thy soul,
For memory of me and of the past,
Where love's regretful dirges sometimes toll.
But when I learned thou hadst for ever cast
Hope to the winds, as men a torn-up scroll,
I looked around to find, or near or wide,
Some worthy work to do before I died.

CCCXXII.

“ When thou hadst sought a haven in the sky,
I, from my haven driven, put forth to sea.
And lo ! from every tower and tocsin high,
Rang out the glad peal, summoning to be free,
Free or for ever slave, the land that I
Loved not the less, because it fathered thee !
Land, crowned with snow and girdled by the foam,
Fair as her Florence, outraged as her Rome !

CCCXXIII.

“Never, Olympia ! since first couchant steel
Leaped from its sheath like lion from its lair,
Did pity plead, arm smite, or bosom feel
For Cause more sacred or divinely fair,
Than torn and mangled Italy’s appeal.
Earth heard, but Heaven it was that crowned her prayer.
The stars our champions were, and with their smiles
Rescuing our swords, confounded tyrants’ wiles.

CCCXXIV.

“Nay, bear with me, Olympia, bear away,
If only for the sake of olden days !
Rome, still forgotten, still in fetters, lay.
I against thee as soon my sword would raise
As ’gainst the altar where thou kneel’st to pray ;
And though I lift no voice of prayer or praise,
In half-believing awe my head I bow,
Before the Faith that fosters such as thou !

CCCXXV.

“’Tis not against the altar I would fling
My feeble body, counting life as dross :
No, but from Peter’s hampered hand to wring
The carnal sword, and leave therein the Cross !
That Rome, unswathed, may from the sepulchre spring,
And Italy no more bewail the loss
Of her first-born, but grouped around her knee
Her dear ones hail,—not fair alone, but free !

CCCXXVI.

“ Ah ! half in darkness on this earth we dwell,
Not in the light, but shadow, of the truth ;
Confounding good with evil, heaven with hell,
Misjudging rage and hate for love and ruth.
But, though our souls thus vainly gnaw their shell,
And manhood seem but disillusioned youth,
I still must hope, the lingering dawn despite,
That slow we move, through liberty, to light !

CCCXXVII.

“ Oh ! if there be, for close of all this ache,
This panting struggle, a celestial goal,
Come with me there, Olympia ! I will take
My blood-stained sword, and thou thy snow-white soul !
Perchance we there shall see that each doth make
Complete the other, and a godlike whole,
From human vision hid, will flash to life,
In that pure atmosphere where melteth strife !

CCCXXVIII.

“ But if I needs must go, leaving thee here,
Pass solitary, silent, to my doom,
I will await thee in whatever sphere
I may awake, of sunshine or of gloom.
For I will never, never yield thee, dear !
While soul surviveth ! Meanwhile, tend my tomb ;
But still remember, that my latest breath
Blent, with thy name, the cry of ‘ Rome or Death ! ’ ”

CCCXXIX.

Faint came the final words, though tightly still
He grasped the widowed hilt she would release,
To join his hands in prayer. "Oh! do His will,
And with the Heavenly Victor make thy peace!
My heart shall keep a nook for thee, until
We meet i' the Land where wrong and sorrow cease.
But oh! bequeath me, ere thou leav'st me lone,
Some hope that we may meet before the Throne!

CCCXXX.

"Thy words have meaning which thou dost not see.
All, all 'twixt Rome must choose, God's Voice hath said,
And endless Death!" "Then, Death," he cried, "for me!"
And waved his broken brand above his head;
Then dropped the hilt, and fell back heavily.
Dragged down by tears, she knelt beside the bed,
And 'gainst the offending hand laid sobbing cheek:—
For love too strong, for martyrdom too weak!

CCCXXXI.

Now, with light jocund step, came young-eyed Morn,
Dancing and singing o'er the eastern hill.
The timorous twilight, blushing, fled forlorn,
And in each thicket awoke pipe and trill.
The world,—the old, worn world,—seemed freshly born,
Eden renewed, where man might drink his fill
Of brimming joy and beauty, nor e'er know
His naked self, that long bequest of woe!

CCCXXXII.

The sluggish mountains, donning crowns of gold,
Uprose to greet the morning. O'er the plain
Of blight and wreck a roseate wave was rolled.
Glowed in the sunlight aqueduct and fane,
No longer ruined. Happy Gods of old
Would soon, it seemed, their ancient seats regain,
And rule once more, from oracle and shrine,
A scene for mortal empire too divine !

CCCXXXIII.

Rome, Rome itself, bathed in auroral sheen,
Its domes, towers, columns, fanned by buoyant gales,
Scanned from afar, one well indeed might ween
A sea of sunlight flecked with joyous sails.
Here, playful fountains leaped, and laughed between ;
There, bright-trunked stone-pines spread their sombre veils
'Twixt earth and sky ; the cracks in temples hoar,
But dimples seemed, with which they smiled once more.

CCCXXXIV.

From narrow humid street, in open square,
Sun-flooded, gathered an unwonted throng ;
And most where saint-crowned pillar clave the air,
Or spouting column soared like voice of song.
In every eye there lurked the angry glare,
In every nerve the self-suppression strong,
Of panthers ere they leap ;—a fearful pause,
Ere bounds the body, and out-curve the claws !

CCCXXXV.

When, all at once, from lip to lip there flew
The rumour that the great Deliverer's tread
Nearer and nearer to the city drew,
Striding across the prostrate tyrant's head.
Some, shimmering in the distant sunlight blue,
Had seen his bayonet-tips and banners red,
Stream o'er the crests of the Nomentan Way ;
And some, 'twas said, had heard his trumpets bray.

CCCXXXVI.

Then all the people started up, and took,
Hotly, their way unto the Eastern gate.
The comfortable cripple left his nook,
And hobbled with the crowd. With quickened gait,
Tall flower-girls straight their fragrant stalls forsook ;
While timid maidens, fearing to be late,
Awaited not their mothers, but entwined
Their hands with baby boys, and ran like wind !

CCCXXXVII.

Yes ! in the sunlight, pinnacles of steel
Flashed, and lithe pennons fluttered in the air ;
And from the ranks they crested rang the peal
Of thunderous drum and many a clarion's blare.
But, pitying Christ ! what do those notes reveal,
And what these ensigns, waved anear, declare ?
The Pontiff's pæan sounds 'neath banners black,
His hellish legions tramping in their track !

CCCXXXVIII.

On,—on,—they came, with rhythmic-moving tread,
His hirelings first, his Gallic prop behind ;
And, last, with sullen step and unraised head,
A haggard, footsore file, whom Death unkind
Forgot to reap ; who neither fell nor fled,
But, caught in toils no valour could unwind
And reft of arms, now with the craven thong
Linking their limbs, toiled painfully along.

CCCXXXIX.

Just ere the vanguard of the long array
The gateway reached, and bright warm bayonet-tips,
Dipping beneath its vault, from sheen of day
Passed, for a moment, into cold eclipse,
The crowd one last look gave, then slunk away :
The men with muttered curses on their lips,
Women with silent anguish in their eyes,
And hate, in hearts of both, that never dies !

CCCXL.

Then to the clang of cymbals and the sound
Of triumph-breathing instruments, swept on
The exultant host through solitude profound :
Past silent-nodding wrecks of Empire gone,
Sallust's choked gardens, Cæsar's toppled mound.
What though bright fountains flashed, bright sunlight shone,
Loud pealed their trumpets, proudly waved their plumes,
Rome's dwellings seemed as empty as her tombs !

CCCXLI.

But as they, onward moving, roused the styes
Where modern squalor supersedes the reign
Of ancient ruin, swarms of black-robed spies,
Shavelings and sbirri, and their servile train,
Began through chink and crack with stealthy eyes
To peer and glance, as when from hole and drain
Foul-feeding vermin thrust suspicious snout,
Ere to their garbage-feast they sally out.

CCCXLII.

But when they saw the Cross-Keys waving high,
And heard Gaul's pompous music fill the air,
Then out they came in shoals,—a various fry:
Some in brown serge, with feet and foreheads bare,
And hempen cord whence hung the rosary ;
Some robed in white, long-bearded, comely, spare,
Whose lofty brows roofed Learning and the Law ;
And some, black-frocked, with clenched ascetic jaw.

CCCXLIII.

Sudden, as though from underground they sprung,
File after file, came troops of tonsured boys,
To whose slim bodies gaudy cassocks clung,
And who from native Freedom's healthy joys
Had, babes, been weaned, and taught an alien tongue.
Their pretty voices swelled the monkish noise,
Their tender forms the sabre-sounding throng,
Their innocent hearts the festival of wrong !

CCCXLIV.

They too, the coiners of the spurious smile,
That round each victor's chariot skip and bark,
Obsequious hounds, the vilest of the vile,
Came thick ; and those, who know not light from dark,
Meek, timorous hearts, whom fear and faith beguile,
And who in storm cling fast to Peter's ark :
And, last, the sceptic souls, who from them thrust
Man's genial dreams, and in the fasces trust.

CCCXLV.

So the armed host, by sycophant and slave,
Friar, and mendicant, and boyish band,
Followed and cheered, marched on with banners brave
To that famed spot on hoary Tiber's strand,
Where Papal statues arrogantly wave
Over the stream forgotten Pagans spanned,
And Papal gaolers, copying the gloom
Of death, have carved a dungeon from a tomb.

CCCXLVI.

Across the bridge they streamed, a hemmed-in crowd,
And up the narrow squalid Borgo passed,
Till lo ! the pile, whose head with sun and cloud
Converses, and whose feet are planted fast
In earth's foundations, rose before them proud,
Stupendous, soaring, dominant, and vast :
Type of that mighty Power which claims to quell
Man's soul, and rule the realms of Heaven and Hell.

CCCXLVII.

Then, as a stream that finds a wider bed,
Over the broad piazza loose they poured,
Between the curving colonnades, and sped
Up the long marble steps, defaced and scored,
Though polished smooth, by many a pilgrim's tread ;
Until no more the glittering cupola soared
Up in the sky, and into shade they passed,
Like that the sun-confronting mountains cast.

CCCXLVIII.

A moment more, and 'neath the atrium pealed
Fresh music, and an army new drew near :
The Church's spiritual ranks, that wield
'Gainst Satan's host the crosier as a spear,
And on their bosoms wear the cross for shield :
Music that ravished the submissive ear,
And gorgeous companies whose pompous train
Dazzled the eye, and dizzy left the brain.

CCCXLIX.

Troops of fantastic friars, endless files
Of eremites and missionaries brought
From sun-scorched lands and ice-engirdled isles ;
Gold-mitred Abbots deep in prayer and thought,
And throne-defying Prelates wreathed in smiles,
Appareled in rich copes with gems inwrought ;
Last, crimson-cassocked Cardinals, who curled
Aloft their heads, as though they swayed the world

CCCL.

Sudden shrilled silver trumpets, and out-flashed,
Quickly as sunlight flashes, mailèd men,
Across whose doublets,—black with yellow slashed,—
Glowed plates of burnished steel, that dazed the ken.
Next, brazen instruments and cymbals clashed,
Rending the lofty portico, and then,
So dread a sight approached, that they who saw
Dropped on their knees, and veiled their eyes for awe.

CCCLI.

For in mid-air, by men upborne, there came,
Enthroned, a venerable man, arrayed
In more than regal glory. Eyes of flame,
Ravished from Juno's bird, his pathway made,
And, cushioned, shone his Triple Crown of fame.
Closed were his lids, but on his features played
A more than mortal radiance; and benign,
O'er the crouched crowd he made the Holy Sign.

CCCLII.

When swept the long procession's final train
Into the august Temple's pillared nave,
Where statued pomp half baffles death's disdain,
And wrings its vauntful triumphs from the grave,
Army and concourse poured into the fane,
Distinguished now no more, but, like a wave,
Over the marble pavement rippling spread,
Till every slab was hid by human tread.

CCCLIII.

Then, with one voice, unto the Lord of Hosts,
Prince, priest, and people, Te Deum loudly sang :
Who hurls the waves against earth's granite coasts,
Swells with His voice the wingless tempest's clang,
Or brings to nought the Mighty's impious boasts.
High up the spacious dome their anthem rang,
And in the air without, with rhythmic stroke,
The accompanying cannon's bounding pulses spoke !

CCCLIV.

But with these proud Hosannas, and the boom
Of insolent artillery that cleaved
Rome's arching sky, ascended too the gloom
Of orphaned hearths, beds widowed, lives bereaved ;
Where He eternally abideth, Whom
Eye hath not seen, ear heard, nor heart conceived.
With awful eyes that scanned the nations wide,
Brooding He sate, His thunders by His side !

END OF ACT III.

ACT IV.

ACT IV.

PROTAGONISTS:

LOVE—RELIGION—COUNTRY—MANKIND.

PLACE:

ROME—PARIS.

TIME:

AUGUST 1870—CLOSE OF MAY 1871.

ACT IV.

I.

AND Miriam's curse came true. The hosts of France
Low in the dust, low in dishonour, lay :
Broken her tumbrils, blunted was her lance,
And tinsel Empire vanished in a day.
The serried tramp of men, the war-steed's prance,
Pennon's proud smile and clarion's boastful bray,
Dominion's madness, glory's lustful dream,
Were swept like wrecks down Fate's unswerving stream.

II.

For drunk by envy's ill-fermenting wine,
And each the other goading 'gainst a throne
Which late by force had proved its right divine,
And, vassal once, had now a rival grown,
Monarch and nation towards the peaceful Rhine,
Journeying through happy vineyards of its own,
Had urged the wheels of war, and, greedy horde,
Into the scales of justice flung the sword.

III.

The sin of ancient years, unhallowed bed,
When without love or honour, law or rite,
Bestial Ambition to the altar led
A ravished nation, giddy with affright,
And with vile lips the assenting victim wed,
Had borne its foul-got brood in all men's sight ;
A bastard offspring, wearing on their face
Brand nor success could hide nor pomp displace.

IV.

And these had waxed to ripeness : sly distrust,
Which covers up its fears with mute assent ;
Curt sneers which sap, base gibes that fret like rust,
The irksome bond of spurious blandishment,
Disinclination deepening to disgust,
Overt reproaches, discord, discontent,
Divided purpose, longings ne'er the same,
And, lastly, naked scandal, dead to shame.

V.

Thus from domestic petulancy grew
The itch of foreign venture. Vexed at home
By weak disunion, throne and rabble threw
Distracting glance athwart the fencing foam.
Now into tropic seas their banner flew,
Now flapped forbidding over yearning Rome,
Now, lured and luring to dismay, unfurled
Its restless folds against the Western world.

VI.

But bootless all. The blight of failure fell
On each deft-trained design ere waxed it ripe,
Which straightway wizened just as it should swell,
And turned to ashes in the Schemer's gripe.
O'erbrooded purpose addled in the shell:
Kings donned their swords, hearing his peaceful pipe;
And when he tricked them into strife, One rose
Colossal o'er a Continent of foes.

VII.

Then, thus confronted, Prince and people wreaked
Their spite upon each other. Baffled pride
Recalled that impious night when sobbed and shrieked
Through smothering hands the violated bride,
And morrow with her murdered kindred reeked.
While, thrusting condonation's pledge aside,
They who trooped willing slaves at Glory's heel,
Clamoured for freedom round its rusted steel.

VIII.

Dazed by his dissipated dreams, aghast
At ghosts he had deemed long laid, spurred by the cries
Of sullen crowds that gathered thick and fast,
Age in his limbs and death-rheum in his eyes,
With vacillating hands the rod he passed
To female counsels, perilous allies,
And pricked by priests and women blind with hate,
Passed to his doom through War's wide-opened gate.

IX.

Then puffed corruption found its issue dire,
Teaching the obeisant multitude how vain
Is purple ostentation's eunuch choir,
When iron battle tramps the trembling plain,
Kneads the lithe golden grain to crimson mire,
And sings thanksgiving over sheaves of slain;
How forward splendour cur-like slinks to heel,
When sceptres clash and wrestling armies reel.

X.

Servility, which brings the base to front,
Indiscipline, the mongrel jade that kicks
Against the whip and to the bit is blunt,
Yoked with confusion, twin in knavish tricks,
Loud braggart fear, that tempts, then shirks the brunt,
And fireside luxury, which purrs and licks
Its velvet paws when wet winds wail without,
Swelled the loose train of predetermined rout.

XI.

And these, by adulating courtiers led,
Lagged forth to meet where flattery smirks in vain,
A phalanxed people, mailed from heel to head,
And moved by law, as by the moon the main.
God, King, and Fatherland, the watchwords sped
From hearth to hearth, as from hill, vale, and plain,
They trooped to call, and drawn towards one sole aim
By one sole will, half-conquered ere they came.

XII.

As sure as poised falcon when it swoops
And strikes, they struck the hesitating foe ;
As swift his heels of panic chased, as whoops
The keen lank wolf after the scuttling roe ;
And close as fanged snake twists its strangling hoops
Around its victim, certain, slimy, slow,
Wide they unrolled their long elastic toils,
Then, folding round him, crushed him in their coils.

XIII.

Then Meuse rolled red with blood and thick with shame,
And Sedan's bootless battlements concealed
Pale hosts of jostling fugitives that came
Clamouring for shelter from its fatal field.
Blind now to glory, deaf and dead to fame,
They sought in fear a friend, disgrace a shield,
And cowering mute in pools of comrades' gore,
Blessed the kind night that hushed the victors' roar.

XIV.

But when the dark pall parted, and they saw
Tombed day come forth to slow possess the sky,
Full on them yawned the cannon's hungry jaw,
And on them glared its fixed, impassive eye.
Lo ! round their terror moving myriads draw
The steel-knit network, surely, silently,
Nor strategy can foil nor valour tear,
No, nor e'en death, though banded with despair.

XV.

Then winged Ambition grovelled on the ground,
And France's Tricolor waxed deadly white.
Her legions to the Teuton's chariot bound,
Her Cæsar's sword surrendered, not in fight,
The spoil-clad victors through her vineyards wound,
O'er prostrate towns, past camps too scared to smite,
On to the harlot City, which in dread
Whined to the world to save her from their tread.

XVI.

Whereat that other City, to the cup
Of her abominations sacrificed,
That she of lusts and glories false might sup,
City in turn of Cæsar and of Christ,
Though now of both long dispossessed, rose up,
And when Gaul's darkening flag no more sufficed
To cover her own bosom, freedom's sun
Felt on her face,—and Italy was one !

XVII.

Then strangled was for aye that bastard thing,
The regal diadem round priestly brows,
And a divine divorce decreed 'twixt King
Of carnal conquests and Christ's spotless spouse.
And though awhile her old affection cling
To the unnatural bond and impious vows,
She yet shall own, her alien banner furled,
That the soul's kingdom is not of this world.

XVIII.

Dragged from the clutches of tenacious death
By Miriam's love, who, when faint skill despaired,
Despaired not, feeding failing breath with breath,
And screening flickering life, till life reflared
Like flame that, hand-protected, brighteneth,
Gilbert, with her, that supreme moment shared,
When, through the gate Mentana's captives trod,
Burst Italy's flag and Savoy's kingly rod.

XIX.

And Godfrid, too, was there. When first he woke
From that submerging swoon wherein he sank
With cry impenitent and raving stroke
That rent Olympia's heart, and saw life's bank
Once more in reach, round him were stranger folk.
He knew not whom to question, whom to thank.
There were no battle-stains his vest upon.
He looked : but lo ! his shattered sword was gone.

XX.

There was a little crucifix instead,
Of silver upon sandalwood, that lay
Close to his cheek, half slipping from the bed :
Which when he reverent would have drawn away,
He saw 'twas fastened by a hempen thread
Round his own neck, so could not go astray,
But, as he moved, moved still with him, and kept
A quiet watch upon him when he slept.

XXI.

He lay not now in squalid ruin built
Of mud and rifled empires. Four white walls,
Blank, saving where there hung Who for man's guilt
Dies always, and in silent anguish calls
Sin to His feet, soft pillows, smoothened quilt,
A silence such as reigns in empty halls,
And by his bed a pot of fragrant flowers,—
These were his company through muffled hours.

XXII.

But he could hear, in corridors without,
The sound of swiftly, softly, passing feet,
That constant to some business moved about,
But did it without noise, or haste, or heat.
Sometimes this movement waned, and quite died out ;
And, always then, he could catch voices sweet,
Just far enough away sick ears to please,
Chanting plain hymns or singing litanies.

XXIII.

And none e'er broke the silence of his door
Save white-cowled sisters, who, with modest speech,
Asked him if felt he easier than before,
Resmoothed his bed, placed food within his reach,
Then glided silently across the floor,
And left. But each so like was unto each,
In office like, and all without a name,
He wondered were they others or the same.

XXIV.

But one there was who never came, for whom
He ever looked with quickly-turning cheek,
Whene'er a fresh foot comforted his room,
For whom he longed, of whom he dared not speak.
At length, one eve, as twilight's jealous gloom
Swept from his wall the sunlight's farewell streak,
He asked, "Where, sister, have I found a home?
Where am I now?" She answered him, "In Rome."

XXV.

Whereat, when she was gone, he wondering lay
Upon his bed. "Ah! Rome or Death!" he mused.
"The stern alternative of that lost fray,
Death, hath missed fire, and destiny refused
The other doom. But no! Did she not say
I am in Rome? 'Tis thus the Gods amused
Fulfil the formulas for which we strive.
I am not dead. Is Italy alive?"

XXVI.

"And where is Gilbert? Miriam, where? Where, she,
The maiden mistress of my soul, that knelt
With darkness, and the howling gusts, and me,
On that distressful midnight when I felt
My being like a bark that takes the sea,
And on known shore beholds dear figures melt
Into dim distance, and the waves and wind
Shut out the sense of all that's left behind.

XXVII.

“Where art thou, dear Olympia? Oh! too dear!”
Then, on his cheek, like one last drop of dew
Day's drought hath spared, lingered an unbrushed tear.
And when, at early morn, a nun-nurse drew
To his bedside, “Who was it brought me here?”
He asked. She answered: “One who prays for you,”
And changed his faded flowers for fresh, and went.
And he, being gentle, gathered what she meant;

XXVIII.

Nor questioned them again, though still his breast
Bounded whene'er a hand might touch his door,
Bounding for nought. But when, self-kempt and drest,
He, quite unhelped, could walk across the floor,
There came a sister older than the rest,
Who said, “You are our prisoner no more,
Who, elsewhere prisoned, would have found release
Scarcely so soon. Now, brother, go in peace.”

XXIX.

And so he went, the little cross around
His neck, and silent sadness in his soul.
And by and by he wrote his thanks profound
To the good nuns who thus had made him whole,
And in whose cloister he had shelter found,
At their own risk, against the prying shoal
Of victor sbirri, pity their sole creed,—
And sent them humble gifts for humble need.

XXX.

Thence he returned to Capri, like a bird
That crawls back to its nest with broken wings ;
Lamenting, lonely, with a voice unheard,
The jar irreconcilable of things,
How at each other Past and Future gird,
How each one's music general discord brings ;
And, with this grief which causeth the world's moan,
Blending a kindred sorrow of his own.

XXXI.

His sole joy seemed to gaze on the bland brow
Of meditating mountains, and the sight
Of that serene felicity which now
Made Gilbert's years seem few, his memories light,
Dead bonds forgotten in a livelier vow ;
But who still lacked, vicissitudes despite,
The philosophic fibre, which perceives
Some goodness e'en in that o'er which it grieves.

XXXII.

One only lesson of the chequered page,
Writ in Mentana's blood, had Gilbert learned ;
Hate 'gainst the throne, against the altar rage,
Which, spite time's cooling breath, more fiercely burned.
Neither did Miriam study to assuage
Fanaticism's fire, but, deafly spurned
Counsel at either ear, with word and act
Fostered the heat, one wiser would have slacked.

XXXIII.

So when the Tyrant's satraps that suppressed
The sobs and yearnings of parental Rome
To fold her prosperous children to her breast,
Hearing his cry of anguish, hurried home,
And Christ's miscrowned Vicegerent stood confessed
In his own strength, across the Tyrrhene foam
Gilbert and Miriam flew with eager breath,
To swell once more the cry of "Rome or Death!"

XXXIV.

But Godfrid watched and waited, nor betook
His footsteps to the mainland till the Flag,
Unto the breeze once more its colours shook,
Which had freed Italy from cape to crag,
And, kingly still, to screen the Shepherd's crook
Now frankly waved. Then no more did he lag,
But hastened, with hot heart, past strand and stream,
To clasp, no vision now, his life's one dream.

XXXV.

And thus he shared, with tears of trembling joy,
That consummating moment : moment rare
In this begrudging planet, where the boy,
Too oft, as man, sees high hopes melt in air,
Or descend grossly, mixed with vain alloy ;
Yet moment warning no one to despair,
And that the nations which, unswerving, wait,
May even tire out time and rescind fate.

XXXVI.

Beyond Rome's kingly hill presumptuous hands
Have swept and garnished, lending rival wrecks
Haphazard names, an enclosed space there stands
Of ruin unreclaimed. No fribbles vex
The silent surface of time's heaped-up sands.
Untrained, unhindered, Nature hides and decks
Man's mingled failures. Rarely human tread
Disturbs this green-grown dust-heap of the dead.

XXXVII.

Lifting a small rude latch, a scranny crone,
Palsied with ague, greets and lets you through.
Then may you mount, unchallenged and alone,
And, sitting, scan dominions old and new,
The Lateran's boastful front, the empty throne
Of Jove and Cæsar, and afar off view
The Sabine mountains, where the shadows fall,
Smiling upon each other, and it all.

XXXVIII.

And here, where desolation's final tide
Advanced and scattered, Godfrid musing lay,
Feeling like one who misses from his side
Something that ne'er before hath been away,
Now that the goal was reached whose course untried
Had filled the blank of many a lonely day,
And, to replace the past, that kindly friend,
Stretched an unfancied Future, void of end.

XXXIX.

He ever and anon could catch the burst
Of pæans popular in far-off street,
Wherein he too had gladly joined at first ;
And as he 'gan to muse that it were meet
This barren joy were not too oft rehearsed,
He heard the sound of slowly-winding feet,
He feared of strangers, but soon hailed, instead,
Gilbert's and Miriam's ever welcome tread.

XL.

Straight, seeing them, he rose, that Miriam might
Choose some smooth seat, though choice in sooth was none.
But ere she reached the rude stair's topmost height,
Halting, she stood ; while Gilbert, like to one
Who, awkward, blurts unwelcome news outright,
“ We must be gone before the set of sun,”
Abruptly said : “ We are but here to tell
Our resolution, and to take farewell.”

XLI.

“ Gone before set of sun ! And farewell ! Why ?
What is this deed I with you may not share ? ”
Godfrid exclaimed. But neither made reply,
And with joint silence paid his wandering stare.
So he continued : “ If 't must be, good-bye !
For I shall miss you. Yet one parting prayer
Grant me, at least ! Oh ! do not, insane, break
This full-shaped Italy you helped to make ! ”

XLII.

“Yes, Italy is made !” cried Gilbert, “though
Within its entrails priest and king still lurk ;
And these must one day follow foreign foe.
This hour is not propitious for the work,
At least not here ; and that is why we go.
At throat of throne-rid France is Teuton dirk ;
But once by her Republic back are hurled
These bravo kings, she then will free the world !

XLIII.

“The Chief has called us round him now once more,
Now for one final, universal stroke,
And Italy shall find on foreign shore
The means wherewith to snap her native yoke.
Thus, thus will we avenge Mentana’s gore,
And coals of fire upon their hearths shall smoke,
Who, duped by despots, now themselves condemn,
Denied us freedom we will bring to them !”

XLIV.

He ceased. But Godfrid made not haste to speak ;
For well he knew that reason’s clearest rays
’Gainst passion’s thronging mists are wan and weak.
So for awhile he did but stand and gaze,
Saying at length, “If find you what you seek,
You will be honoured in all coming days.
The world hath not yet journeyed to its end,
And he who helps it onward is its friend.

XLV.

“ But, oftener far, presumption’s hasty hand
Mars the slow-shaping form it fain would mould.
Forgive me ! Your great Chief for this fair land
Hath done what long in story shall be told :
But that he quits her now for foreign strand,
Will leave me less regretful than consoled.
The rest she needs, ’tis not his part to give ;
And he might slay whom once he helped to live.

XLVI.

“ But how of that ambiguous Cause he goes
To aid, will you the original sin repair ?
I look, but can see only kites and crows
Fighting for carrion in the empty air.
Sooth ! to be arbiter betwixt such foes !
Each, thanks to statecraft’s wants, hath borne a share
In Italy’s redemption. She should stand
Aloof from both, her winnings in her hand.

XLVII.

“ Yet, let truth own there was one wily friend
Who loved her somewhat for herself ; and he,
Because he did not love her to the end
And, without swerving, serve her loyally,
Hath toppled to perdition none can mend.
But who were those that grudged to find her free,
And halved his mind ? To Gaul’s eternal shame,
Priests and the people’s prophets, all the same !

XLVIII.

“Republic ! Empire ! Words that feed no want.
What are they but authenticated sound,
Fine names, not virtues, given at the font,
Affection’s o’er-fond labels ? Look around
At history’s wide horizon ! O, fie on’t !
Better, with millstone round one’s neck, be drowned
In sludge of foul oblivion, than loose seas
Of blood ’gainst seas of blood for feuds like these !

XLIX.

“No ! France must pay the ransom of the wrong
Done to herself at first, to others last ;
Nor will just Time take dithyrambic song
In quittance of the madness of the past.
Eleutheromaniacs round her rudder throng,
And wild she drives. Oh ! if the die be cast,
May you ne’er sigh, mid wreck of world-wide hopes,
For home’s sure weal and Capri’s narrow slopes !”

L.

Slowly the last words trembled to their close,
And, trembling still, who uttered them was dumb.
Dumb, too, were they, unwilling to oppose
To friendship’s pleading voice the drowning drum
And roll of passion, better kept for foes.
So Gilbert said, “We knew you would not come.
But we must start forthwith. Say, will you cheer
Our parting feet, or bid us farewell here ?”

LI.

“Nay, let us hence then,” Godfrid said, and straight
Adown the ruins’ twisting track they went ;
Nor strove he more to turn them from their fate,
But only on last offices intent
Seemed anxious, more than they, they were not late.
And soon the remnant rapid hours were spent.
By Tullius’ levelled walls they, silent grown,
Parted, and Godfrid was in Rome alone.

LII.

There he abode, his temperate sword laid by,
Content to scan, complete, the work it planned ;
With peaceful hand suborned by searching eye
Tending the needs of his adopted land,
And paid by its soft tongue and smiling sky :
All through that long white winter, when the brand
Of lurid war fired Gaul’s luxurious roofs,
And crouched her sons ’neath havoc’s scouring hoofs.

LIII.

For all in vain had scrambling tribunes snatched
From Cæsar’s blundering hand the rod and flag,
And ’gainst the advancing victors, fumbling, patched
The rents of Empire with the ready rag
Of a Republic, from the gutter scratched.
In vain the phrase-plumed rhetoricians’ brag,
The strut of hucksters panoplied, the loud
War-prattle of an armed unmastered crowd.

LIV.

Hemmed in by silent steel and the clinched jaws
Of them that bared its edge, that stronghold lewd,
Semiramis of cities, whose soft laws
Make licit the illicit, till, subdued,
E'en genius pandars to her self-applause,
Now with her own sleek self herself at feud,
Lacked, as she stood effeminate at bay,
The antlers male to hew herself a way.

LV.

And loudly to her lovers called, to leap
To arms for her sore sake, that yestertide
In her delight delighted, and drank deep
Of her lascivious wine-cups, and but vied
To share the perfumes of her wanton sleep :
But these had slipped away from her roused side,
And from far-off beheld the loveless spears
Couched 'gainst her breast and callous 'gainst her tears.

LVI.

Then wailed she to her kindred, who sate scared
In innocent plain homes, whose cleanness she
Had outraged with her harlotries and spared
Nor scoff nor stain in days when she was free,
Corrupting to her dainties those she snared,
And mocking those who blushed her shame to see,
That they would beat the ploughshare to a sword,
And die for her who had but danced and whored.

LVII.

And these, because she was their blood, and they
Had talked of her from childhood, left their fields,
All saving sunny boy and grandsire gray,
And seizing, inept, rude swords and shields,
Each other jostling, crowding every way,
Led by rash valour inexperience wield,
Strove and re-strove, forgetful of her sin,
To break the ring of wrath that hemmed her in !

LVIII.

But no more clove it than the fume-foggy sea,
Recurrent, liberates a sand-locked lake
Of stagnant brackish water ; since that she,
Counting devotion duty, for her sake,
And sure that men or gods would set her free,
Stretched feeble hands or none, herself, to break
The circuit of her isolation, clinched
Closer about her all the more she flinched.

LIX.

And when, unhelped by gods or men, she saw
From off her sybaritic tables melt
The dainties dressed for her voluptuous maw
In days of fat concubinage, and felt
Mute hunger her fastidious entrails gnaw,
Then she, so long unused to kneeling, knelt,
And, kissing with her unloved lips the dust,
Sued to the foe to do what seemed just.

LX.

And he, because he was just, would have stripped
The tinsel from her forehead, and torn off
The mimic steel in which she was equipped,
Making of Mars a mock, of death a scoff.
But once more in the dust her brow she dipped,
And tearfully besought she need not doff
Her new-found gewgaws, but might peaceful wear
Spurs on her heel and war-plumes in her hair.

LXI.

And he, in part for scorn, in part that he Knew she against herself would quickly turn
Her foolish weapons, once her limbs were free,
Bade her retain them, but with visage stern
Told her go find and fetch unto his knee
Ransom of gold she in the days did earn
When all men bought her pleasure, and until
She forfeit paid, his sword should guard her still.

LXII.

This, from afar, foreseen with certain ken,
Had Godfrid watched, in Rome abiding still,
Through that lone winter, until Spring again,
That hastens nor delays for good or ill,
Or aught that haps the fitful fate of men,
Came, in her blushing beauty, o'er the hill,
Kissing to softness air and earth and skies,
Youth's candid coyness laughing in her eyes.

LXIII.

From crevices in wrinkled ruins sprung
Flowers fresh as childhood ; to each dark dank grot
Pierced warmth and light ; each dumb grove found a tongue.
The sepulchres of eld their gloom forgot,
Cradling new life, and Rome, a moment young,
Confessed that liberation's hymn is not
So sweet as that the vernal chorus sing,
Nor even Freedom half so fair as Spring.

LXIV.

Tidings the while had fitful reached him there
Of Gilbert and of Miriam : lines at first
Writ in hope's flowing hand and symbols fair,
Then by a pen in halting doubt immersed,
And, finally, disfigured by despair,
That more betrayed than plain bespoke the worst ;
Blent with recrimination, rage, distrust,
Which railed 'gainst all, and paused not to be just.

LXV.

Now Earth, now Heaven, now kings, now crowds, were taxed
With burden of the failure. France itself,
And its too prosperous sons, had craven waxed,
But caring furtively to count their pelf.
Then 'twas the Purple Robe that had relaxed
Their fibre, narrowing to the well-stocked shelf
Their vile affections. Last, they were betrayed
By their own Chiefs. And where was Europe's aid ?

LXVI.

Then Godfrid wrote : " Come back, and be at peace.
You have done all it befits man to do,—
Fought for the faith that 's in you. But now, cease !
With Miriam quick recross the waters blue,
And we will back, ere yet the years decrease,
Which once seemed many, that now seem so few,
To our dear island home, and there remain,
Loving the land we bled for not in vain."

LXVII.

But still they came not ; though the timid Spring
Grew confident, and all the snows were gone,
E'en from cold clefts. Louder the birds did sing
Louder the streams ; the sun more broadly shone,
And life was more like life with everything.
But still they came not ; and the weeks went on,
And still they came not : till—afoot,—abed,—
Godfrid began to feel a shapeless dread.

LXVIII.

It was the season of the year when he
Felt Reason's reasons useless, and when most
His heart, suffused with sensibility,
Owned fortitude the untried sophist's boast.
For 'twas the season when he first did see
The face of Olive, mute unwalking ghost
That slept in Florence, but still came between
His thoughts and peace, like waves that sound unseen.

LXIX.

But, more than this, than all that e'er had been,
Or e'er could be, it was the season bland
When, flying from a world of noise and sin,
His feet had touched Spiaggiascura's strand,
Beheld Madonna's chapel, sought to win
Olympia's love, ta'en with her, hand in hand,
That sweet sad journey, then, with speechless pain,
Left her betwixt the mountains and the main.

LXX.

Once in the winter, as the time came round
To send his yearly gift of gratitude
To those with whom he life and shelter found
After Mentana dire, he thought he would
Be his own envoy. Through moist streets he wound,
And soon before the Convent portals stood,
With half-owned hope to find, within, some clue
To her, withal he never could pursue.

LXXI.

He rang, and loud through corridor unseen
Echoed his peal ; making him wince the while
To think that cloisters sheltered and serene
He with unbidden clamour should defile.
But quick a novice peeped through grated screen,
Then opened ; saying, with a settled smile
Not on her lips or lids, but, as it were,
All o'er her face, " How can we serve you, sir ? "

LXXII.

“May I the Mother Abbess see?” he said.
“Will’t please you, sir, to enter?” And she straight
Into a spacious whitewashed chamber led,
Where hung but Christ, and left him there to wait.
And by and by the door was openèd,
And entered unto him with cheerful gait
That Sister reverend who, when erst did cease
His wounds and weakness, bade him go in peace.

LXXIII.

After obeisance, “Mother,” he began,
“What hitherto I sent I here have brought,
To recognise—repay I never can,—
All that you did for me in days distraught.”
“My son,” she said, “to succour suffering man
Is our dear duty, and you owe us nought.
I take it for our Lord’s sake, Whom we owe
All things. Mayhap ’twill soothe some other’s woe.”

LXXIV.

Then all seemed said, and he was fain to go,
Though loth; when, taking courage from his fear,
“Forgive me, Mother!” he exclaimed, “if so
I ’chance transgress; but have you sister here
Men call Olympia, whom I once did know?”
“We have,” she said; “a sister very dear.”
“And is she well and happy? Tell me true!”
“She is, my son, and always prays for you.”

LXXV.

And then he knew that he must ask no more,
But go ; and with obeisance fresh he went,
Feeling more lone and restless than before,
And more than ever sundered from content.
And whensoever he spied a form that wore
That convent's habit, straight his steps he bent,
And, unobserved, glanced quick, in hopes he should
Find her mourned face beneath the modest hood.

LXXVI.

But never found he the one face he sought,
Though more than once he seemed to recognise
Those who, when lay he as their guest, had brought
Food to his needs and comfort to his sighs.
Had he forgotten how she looked ? he thought ;
Or was he duped by her austere disguise ?
Then would he smile, as men, ta'en unawares,
Smile at a thought they had which was not theirs.

LXXVII.

But as he thus more solitary grew,
And anxious more to learn how it might fare
With Gilbert and with Miriam, rumours new
Began to flock and hover in the air,
That what the wise foresaw was coming true,
And that the harlot city, in despair
At her own degradation, up had leapt,
And turned against herself the arms she kept.

LXXVIII.

Thence, before long, authentic tidings came,
Written with Gilbert's hand, and thus they ran :
"Lo ! Paris tolls the knell of human shame,
Knell for which time hath yearned since time began.
Not now for kings, priests, soldiers, country, fame,—
Vampires or vainest shadows,—but for Man,
Man too long gaoler of himself, we shake
The wearied limbs of War, and bid them wake.

LXXIX.

"Once more, but only once, his blackened brand
Shall he re-snatch, and lighting as it waves,
It shall be burned to ashes in his hand,
And then be flung into the odious graves
Of night, and greed, and all things bad and banned :
But not till it hath fired the dens of slaves,
Scorched thrones like stubble, and those altars smoked
Whose steps were long with human faggots choked.

LXXX.

"Paris hath been cajoled, betrayed, by chiefs
That kept one foot in the foe's camp and held
Parley with kings, for fear the People's griefs
Should by her kingless triumph be dispelled.
Their season now hath vanished like the leaf's,
Their sceptre like the rotten trunk lies felled ;
Their sycophantic pomp hath joined the dead,
And every crawling parasite hath fled.

LXXXI.

“What ! back to Capri now ! now that the hour
Of centuries’ gestation waits its birth !
When Freedom, born in panoply of power,
With godlike brain shall renovate the earth,
And Light, and Right, and all fair things, shall flower.
No ! Godfrid ! Burst, yourself, convention’s girth,
And shed the tatters shrunk tradition winds,
To hide their bareness, round your shivering minds !

LXXXII.

“You want a Faith. Behold the Faith that feeds
The hunger of the heart all else but starves !
Faith that shall dispossess usurping creeds,
Incense, and train of priests, and fatted calves,
Vain supplications for phantasmal needs !—
Faith in Mankind : not faith that feels by halves,
But faith complete, whose dogmas shall redeem
Humanity from its distempered dream !

LXXXIII.

“Fling off the loose impeding folds of doubt,
Standing, tight-mailed, in arms of confidence,
And put the pale Past’s gibbering ghosts to rout
That fool you with their shadowy pretence,
And shut the Future’s dawning daylight out !”
More still there was, but ever in this sense ;
And just one word from Miriam, which but said :
“Come to us, Godfrid, and no more live dead !”

LXXXIV.

Still walking, as he read it line by line,
Through undistracting Rome, his feet had strayed,
What time 'twas ended, to the Esquiline,
Where, at its summit, the fair Mother-Maid,
Spouse of the Spirit, has her chiefest shrine,
And on Corinthian column undecayed,
From fane long vanished, with soft-victor shoon
Stands in the hollow of a crescent moon.

LXXXV.

'Twas the last day of March, mid-way between
Noon and slant eve. The air, the sky, was bland,
Even as She, Protectress of the scene.
Around, beyond, afar as near at hand,
Lopped arch and jagged wall with mantle green,
Calm wrecks of world-wide conquest and command,—
These the dumb comment, as his eyes he raised
From Gilbert's sanguine page, and round him gazed.

LXXXVI.

“Mankind ! Faith ! Future !” mournfully he cried,
Folding the letter ; “Who shall build new faith
Mid ruins such as these ! The Gods have died,
The beautiful grand Gods, and but their wraith
Haunts the forsaken spots they sanctified.
Empire, Religion, Truth,—all perisheth.
Cæsar hath gone, and Christ seems following fast :
Only our wants and weak deceptions last.”

LXXXVII.

So musing, towards the marble steps he walked
Of the Basilica, and sate him down ;
Where past his mind the long procession stalked
Of vestals, shepherds, wearers of the Crown,
Tribunes and senators, and consuls baulked
Of regal gewgaws by the People's frown,
Pontiffs, and Emperors that mighty were—
Mere voices wailing in the unechoing air.

LXXXVIII.

There sate he, as the sunshine slowly died,
While ever and anon, behind his back,
Some one the heavy curtain thrust aside,
And, past him, down the steps took homeward track :
Happier, that they before the Babe Who cried
In Bethlehem, had laid life's heavy pack ;
Monk, peasant, mendicant, the halt, the hale,
But all sad-burthened with some human tale.

LXXXIX.

"I too must go," he murmured. "Unlike those
Who have passed onwards, I can nowhere cast
The burden of my weakness and my woes,
Which I, unhelped, must carry to the last."
Just then, once more the heavy curtain rose
Behind him, and adown the steps there passed,
Slowly, the figure of a nun who wore
The habit dear to him for evermore.

XC.

He had not seen her face, her aspect, ought
Men would call hers. But he had staked his soul
It was Olympia ! and, as quick as thought,
Sprang forward, and forgetful of control,
Clutched at her robe. " O thou whom I have sought
Along lone course that seemed to have no goal,
Speak to me ! Let me see thy face, and hold
Thy hand in mine once more, ere mine grows cold ! "

XCI.

" Godfrid ! " And paler than the snow-white hood,
Worn where once gleamed her sunny-rippling hair,
Glued to the spot by memory, she stood :
She looked into his face, she muttered prayer,
Quick,—then exclaimed, as though 'twas all she could,
" Have you the cross ? " " I have," he said, "'tis there ! "
His left hand pressed against his heart, his right
Creeping the while towards hers, clasped close and tight.

XCII.

" I felt it was thy hand, Olympia ! placed
The cord and cross around my neck ; and hence,
Mid all beside discarded or effaced,
It ne'er hath been, shall ne'er be lifted thence.
But, tell me : from the lone Campagna's waste,
When I lay reft of sword, and strength, and sense,
How didst thou move and carry me to Rome,
And how conceal me in thy Convent home ? "

XCIII.

“It was Madonna did it all,” she said,
“Not I, nor any other. All that night,
That long, sad night, upon the rough straw bed,
The best that I could find, you raved in fight,
Still wandering ’mong the dying and the dead,
Deaf to my voice, my touch, my tears, my fright.
So I could only kneel at your bedside,
And weep my soul out to Christ crucified.

XCIV.

“He did not seem to hear me. Then I turned,
And prayed Madonna she would make Him hear ;
She who no supplication ever spurned,
Nor ever looked down, tearless, on a tear.
And slowly she for me a hearing earned
With her dread Son ; for, as began to peer
Twilight’s first streaks and through the crannies crept
Of the old Tower, you calmer grew and slept.

XCV.

“Then I shut out the long sharp rays of light
As best I might, lest they should prick your sleep ;
And lo ! you lay as still as a babe might
A nurse hath hushed, that late did fret and weep.
Nor when I dressed your wounds,—O piteous sight !—
Your sword-gashed brow, your chest pierced wide and deep,
Woke you or stirred. But tell me, brother ! how
You since have fared, and do they plague you now ?”

XCVI.

He winced, for that word "brother" hurt him more,
Heard on her lips, than sharpest stroke e'er dealt
On sternest battlefield ; but he forbore,
Manfully, to betray the pang he felt.
Baring his brow, he showed her where it wore
Mark of the gash, and next, above his belt,
Where the chest-wound had cicatrized in part.
And then she saw the Cross lay 'gainst his heart.

XCVII.

He covered it afresh, likewise his brow,
But not ere she had noted that his hair,
Pure chesnut once, was slowly silvering now.
"At times," he said, "I feel them. But I bear
The smart most gladly ; for they were, I vow,
Got honestly, Olympia ! and thy share
In healing wounds thus won in worthy strife,
Still more endears them to my lonely life."

XCVIII.

She spake not, nowise by the words incensed :
But he could see once more the pale lips pray,
And feel the hands he touched, pressed tight against
The rosary that in her girdle lay.
"But tell me !" he exclaimed ;—"for sure thou ken'st
I long have yearned to hear,—how the whole way
To Rome, through hostile lines, thou didst contrive
To bear me, not their captive, though alive?"

XCIX.

“Ah ! if you knew Madonna, would you ask ?
The day dawned full, and still you, breathing, slept.
Then I, by her inspired, began to task
My troubled brain to save you ; and I stepped
Into the air. When lo ! upon a cask
Of wine-cart from Correse that slow crept
O’er the old track of the Nomentan way,
Romewards, a half-waked contadino lay.

C.

“He murmured a good-morrow, and I prayed
That he would halt a moment ; and he did.
Whereat I said he would be only paid
By Heaven in doing that which I should bid.
There was a wounded man must be conveyed
Straightway to Rome, and in his cart be hid.
I too should go, and on the wain would sit,
And, for the rest, that I would see to it.

CI.

“He mused an instant, and then shook his head.
It was a perilous thing to do, was’t not,
At such a prying time ? But when I said
That Christ’s dear Mother wished it, down he got.
For She had always stood him in good stead,
He must confess, since first he wailed in cot.
Besides, one of my Order late had nursed
His eldest boy, who now had seen the worst.

CII.

“So he would do it for Her sake and mine,
And we must see him through it. Then we shook
Loosely between the re-ranged casks of wine
Two sheaves of oaten straw from neighbouring stook,
And slowly lifting you, who made no sign,
Laid you thereon, and strove to make it look,
By covering you with hay and sheepskin mats,
That there was nought but fodder and the vats.”

CIII.

Again she paused ; and he was mute, for woe,
Gazing upon her with blent love and awe.
Her nun's tale told she simply, even as though
Nun she had ever been. But he,—he saw
The free-born girl, that like the bounding roe
Glanced o'er the down or flitted through the shaw,
And 'neath whose garb reserved still lurked the wild
Prompt helpful instincts of the mountains' child.

CIV.

“Yes, dear?” he said, to end the pause. “And then?”
“Well, then I got upon the wain, whilst he Walked by his mules to ease their load, and when None was in sight, I used to peep and see
If still you slept, nor looked like dying men,
And, when I dared, your head and chest left free,
Lifting the hay and sheepskins ; though, for fear,
Oft I replaced them when was no one near.

CV.

“Thus slowly crept we on, the heavy wain
Jolting and swaying o’er the rough-hewn stones,
Making me wince in terror of your pain,
And fancy that I caught your waking groans.
But you lay hushed ; and when to the good swain
Fresh groups of soldiers spoke in cheery tones,
Returning his salute or proffering theirs,
I knew Madonna had o’erheard my prayers.

CVI.

“‘See now,’ I said to him, ‘is nought to fear ;
And you your charity will never rue.’
He answered, ‘ Mary grant it ! Yet ’tis clear
These harm me not because they reverence you.
Ha ! I can tell you, if you were not here,
I should have had to broach for not a few.
But when we reach the Gate, how then ? For there,
Excise-dogs nose and rummage everywhere.’

CVII.

“Thus did he warn me in his homely way,
As we drew nearer, nearer unto Rome,
While I could only quiet sit, and pray.
But when the last ascent of all we clomb
That hides the city, and lo ! there it lay
Before us full, crowned by great Peter’s dome,
My heart grew most of me, and I began,
Wavering in faith, to frame some human plan.

CVIII.

“But ere I could devise one, there we were,
There at the Gate! and, round, a prying band.
Then prompt the peasant said, ‘Look here, good sir!’
Addressing him that seemed to have command,
‘What must I pay? There’s nothing, I aver,
Save wine-casks,—you can count them with your hand,—
That pays the tax. I have the money here:
Take it, I beg, and give us passage clear.

CIX.

“‘Yon sister sitting on the cart is pressed
To reach her home. To help her on her way,
Who helps us others. I my mules distressed,
That have not had or bite or sup to-day,
And crawl half-dead for want of food and rest.
So pray you let us on without delay.’
The which he said with such a simple air,
I did not think they could refuse his prayer.

CX.

“Withal, the others ’gan the cart to scale,
While he addressed came over to my side.
‘Is’t true, good sister? And will you go bail
For this fair yokel’s word?’ I quick replied,
‘Yes, he hath told you, sir, an honest tale.
Upon his wine-cart he hath let me ride
Straight from Mentana; and his wine’s the whole
Of what it bears on which you levy toll.’

CXI.

“And therewithal content, he called his folk
Off from the wain, and told them to desist.
Just at that very moment you awoke,
Likely because your sleep the motion missed,
And straight began to struggle, rave, and choke,
Under the hay and sheepskins. Then I wist
That all was lost. And, powerless what to do,
I prayed Madonna, and she got us through.

CXII.

“Then through the city safe we went. But see,
My sisters I was waiting for come out
Of the Basilica.” He turned ; and three
Who wore Olympia’s garb, demure, devout,
The steps descended, two of whom could he
At once recall ’mong those who moved about
The room where he had helpless lain for hours,
Brought food, smoothed sheet, and changed his faded flowers.

CXIII.

“This, sister, is the wounded brother who,
Three years ago, was in our Convent nursed.”
“O yes, I well remember, do not you?”
Quickly exclaimed the one that spoke the first.
“Yes, perfectly,” the second ; “he that through
The chest was gashed, and could not sleep for thirst.”
Then both put questions tenderly, the while
The third looked on with blandly holy smile.

CXIV.

Answering, he strove to thank them ; feeling, though,
Helpless the while, as feel we when we strive
To bless heaven for good things. " You doubtless know,
Kind sisters mine, though in your useful hive
You work without much buzzing, that I owe
To this good nurse, that I am still alive.
And never having seen her since that day,
I had so much to ask, so much to say."

CXV.

" We love her very dearly," said the nun
Who had as yet been silent. " Yes, and now,
She is to leave us," added quick the one
That spoke before. " To leave you ! Leave you how ? "
Godfrid exclaimed. " To work elsewhere, my son,"
Rejoined the third. " She but obeys her vow,
And goes where our dear Lady wants her aid,
Who is her prop. For her, be not afraid !

CXVI.

" They need more help in Paris, now that there
Men fight anew, and many die, 'tis said.
She is the only sister we can spare,
And escort but awaits. She hither led
Our steps, that she might say one parting prayer
Where Mary's worthiest temple rears its head.
But, sir, we must be going. In the sky
Ave Maria is fast drawing nigh."

CXVII.

So he was fain, though loth, to let them go,
Olympia with them ; touching not her hand,
But speeding all alike with reverence low :
Feeling thereon like one who late might stand
Within that Gate where Virgins white as snow
Follow the Lamb through the celestial Land,
And then sits dark without, and sees alone
His sinful self, and hears the silence moan.

CXVIII.

That night, upon his bed he sleepless lay,
His face turned upwards, e'en not courting sleep ;
Hearing, below, a fountain flickering play
With stillness, then into its basin leap,
And wishing, all the while, that it were day.
But soon as ever light began to peep
Betwixt his lattice, up he got, as so
To make the advent of the day less slow.

CXIX.

And when the sunlight flushed the summits topped
With statue or with stone-pine, and in street
The noise grew steadier, off he sped, nor stopped
Till once more at the Convent paused his feet.
There, the same novice the same curtsey dropped,
Led to the same room with same welcome sweet,
Where, at same interval, there crossed the door
The selfsame reverend figure as before.

CXX.

“Mother!” he said, “I haply yester-eve
Your daughter saw, whom I Olympia call.”
“I know you did, my son, with Heaven’s good leave,
As told me she herself, who tells me all.
Your interview was timely ; for I grieve—
Though in our life such partings oft befall,—
To think she quits us shortly, and but waits
An escort unto France, to leave our gates.”

CXXI.

“Mother!” he gravely said, “why not let me,
Me be her escort? I have close friends twain
In Paris, whom I straight must go and see,
And, be it not too late, snatch back, insane,
From maelstrom into which, no longer free,
Foolish and wise alike seem swirled amain.
Can I not take her, since our bourne is one,
Leaving her where you will, the journey done?”

CXXII.

“I shall remain your debtor to the end,
And thanks must be my ransom. But intrust
To me this treasure, it I will defend
From hurt, as I would keep my sword from rust.
From morn to eve will I her steps attend
As faithfully yet distantly as must
Some dim meek satellite its unreach’d star,
Following her orbit fondly, but afar!”

CXXIII.

“My son!” she said, “so be it. Nothing loth,
I will commit this jewel without flaw,
To you, to her, to Him Who died for both;
Hoping thereby her heavenly track may draw,
Not by the force of wavering human troth,
But by a steadier and diviner law,
The erratic course of your unguided soul
Into its own, and thence towards God, its goal.

CXXIV.

“I know each prayer she breathes, each gift would make
Of her own will before the Throne of Grace,
Each sacrifice of self, each act, each ache,
Each flood of tears before Christ’s wounded face,
She breathes, she makes, she offers for your sake.
For you she works; she puts you in the place
Of her own soul; as though, so linked your lot,
She too must perish if she saves you not!”

CXXV.

He strove to speak out, but spake not. Tears, not words,
Choked up the outward avenues of sense;
And so he silent stood, as one that girds
His will ’gainst weakness. “Come then, three days hence.
And since our claustral matins, like the birds’,
Are chanted early, come betimes; though whence
You start, or which the road you take, content
To you I leave.” “I will,” he said, and went.

CXXVI.

So three days thence they started ; journeying first
'Twixt leagues of land and sea, on wings of wind,
Through matted swamps, where Spring afresh had burst
From hirsute thickets, flushing root and rind
With youth's warm sap, and over jungles cursed
With death and all man's passage leaves behind,
Trailing bright trains of flowers, and with her song
Peopling the desert as she tripped along.

CXXVII.

Thus came they unto Leghorn, where they found
A vessel of the place, with oil and fruit
Freighted for Nice, but first to Genoa bound.
On this, at stroke of sundown, they set foot,
And shortly felt its mammoth bosom bound
Beneath them, and beheld the waters shoot
To right and left, and watched the long white trail
Behind them in the gloaming grow more pale.

CXXVIII.

But when morn's glance first glinted o'er the sea,
Before them was the city that they knew,
Where once they parted, and had ceased to be,
A hope, which now they never could renew.
The waked winds in the shrouds sang merrily
O'erhead, and bustled merrily the crew ;
While, every instant, drew the land more near,
And shone the marble palaces more clear.

CXXIX.

Into the crescent port mid-track they made,
Straight as an arrow lies on bow tight-strained,
Then furled their sails, swung round, and—anchor weighed,—
Till veered the shadows eastward, there remained.
Olympia to a Convent visit paid,
Guided by Godfrid, who then slowly gained
The spot where he had lifted her upon
The mule, and watched them both till they were gone.

CXXX.

There, all the morning, on the sands he sate,
Marking with passive tenor, sadly sweet,
The breakers rise, curve, fall, then spread out flat,
And swirl in selfsame eddies at his feet.
But when the sun looked downwards, up he gat,
Bending his steps to the town-girt retreat
Where he had left Olympia, and once more
Conveyed her to the vessel from the shore.

CXXXI.

And soon they were afresh upon the sea,
Hearing no more discordant tongues of men,
But only ocean's plastic melody,
With wave attuned to wave, attuned again
To wave, where every wave withal was free.
And, there, before them zigzagged, full in ken,
The road they traversed, in the final stage,
Long years ago, of their vain pilgrimage.

CXXXII.

Sometimes they lost it, but it ever stole
Once more to view, a white conspicuous track,
As though it beckoned towards its own set goal,
And said to them with silent looks, "Come back !"
But there is no returning for the soul,
Since what is past is past for aye, alack !
And mountain road, to one sole bourne that goes,
But mocks vague man, whose pathway no one knows.

CXXXIII.

Full many a little town they could descry,
Passed through of old, and sometimes catch the peal
Of church-bells ringing between slope and sky.
Lo ! there the spot where took they mid-day meal,
And yonder where they did the first night lie.
But 'mong the hills as dusk began to steal,
They saw no more, though sorely did he long
To note where once she sang her even-song.

CXXXIV.

But when dawn purpled wave and hill once more,
He found Olympia kneeling on the deck,
With eyes intently fastened on the shore,
Where Spiaggiascura shone, a little speck ;
Which, as the vessel ever westwards bore,
Past deep smooth creek, past jutting cape and neck,
Laced with white foam, still plainer, larger, grew,
Until it stood, its very self, in view.

CXXXV.

Yes ! there the little city, and lo ! there
The marble chapel, straight afront the sea,
Where he had carried her Spring posies fair,
Had heard the hummings of the truant bee,
Pale butterflies seen flickering everywhere,
Before Madonna with her bent the knee,
Brought love and ache where all was peace before,
And given his heart away for evermore.

CXXXVI.

Straining his gaze, and with the bodily eye
Coupling perchance fond fancy's quick-fooled ken,
Once, twice—there ! there !—he thought he could descry
The very beck, the very mountain glen,
Where, while the lark shrilled loud, he saw her try
To reach the tantalizing thorn, and then
A tiptoe tried once more, but only shook
Its snow upon herself and on the brook.

CXXXVII.

Quickly he glanced to see if, like to him,
She recognised the first dear place of old.
But she saw nothing now but misty rim
Of tears that down her cheeks slow-trickling rolled,
And, save to her soul's sight, all else was dim :
While he could only stand by and behold,
Speechless, her speechless pain, nor breathe one throe
Of all he felt, to share or soothe her woe.

CXXXVIII.

There knelt she, mute and motionless, until
Again Spiaggiascura fainter grew,—
The vessel through the west waves arrowing still,—
Slow dwindled to a speck, then quick to view
Was lost behind a seaward-jutting hill.
Then up she got, and softly towards him drew,
While he, scarce knowing what to say, or how,
Asked her who watched Madonna's chapel now.

CXXXIX.

"You must not talk to me of that," she said,
"I cannot bear it. Let us shred some lint,
Whereof will much be needed; or, instead,
You might, an't please you, whittle wood for splint,
And I that simpler task, or ply my thread."
So down they sate, offering or taking hint,
And working busily. But she no more,
That day, cast look or thought toward the shore.

CXL.

Anon she said, "Pray tell me who are those
That have on Paris this dread carnage brought
Anew, and count their own compatriots foes.
They must be very wicked." Then he thought:
How shall I make her understand the woes
Of either camp, and why the twain have fought,
When even they who scan the horizon wide
Of human passion, do but take a side?

CXLI.

“Listen!” he said, “and you yourself shall judge
If one or other merely wicked be,
Or if mischance, may-be, hath wreaked its grudge
On both, and forced this joint extremity.
When conscience sees clear, conscience need not budge :
But there are times it cannot clearly see
This way, or that, and then it strives to stand,
Holding an even balance in its hand.

CXLI.

“No easy task, Olympia ! even when
The solitary conscience thus is tried.
When conscience jostles second conscience, then
Where shall we find third conscience to decide?
This is the last perplexity of men,
For which, you know, the red-robed martyrs died,
Men holy deemed have men deemed holy given
To pain and death, unpitied and unshriven.

CXLI.

“I hope you do not think me wicked, dear !
Because my conscience jars your conscience so,
That we have been apart this many a year,
Who might have been together.” “O no ! no !”
Quick, she exclaimed. “That, you need never fear.
I always think of you as good, and know,
Whether your conscience be Christ’s foe or friend,
His Precious Blood will save you at the end.”

CXLIV.

She ceased. And he made haste not to reply,
For all his soul was trembling. When he spake,
'Twas with a quivering voice and filmy eye.
"Sweet words, Olympia, that much mend my ache ;
And I am glad to hear them ere I die.
I would have given up all things for your sake,
Save what none can give, yet themselves remain
A gift worth having,—candour without stain.

CXLV.

"Yet what a human tragedy is here !
We have not clashed on battlefield, but ours,
Pathos, and pain, and many a wasteful tear,
Dropped silent through the barren-ticking hours.
Tragic enough ! when one, that one holds dear,
Buds not, despite love's coaxing sun and showers !
But we, though one, keep two, for conscience' sake,
Not dying sooth, but living at the stake.

CXLVI.

"There was no help,—there now can be no cure.
Withal, who stanch'd my wounds and bathed my brow ?
Who, if not you, the pitiful, the pure,
Forgetting all except compassion's vow ?
Yet, as before the Cause that can allure
Service like yours, I bow my head, allow,
Allow, Olympia !—for indeed 'tis true—
That they who served with me were upright too.

CXLVII.

“See then, my child, the tragedy, and see
What feeds it. Love, Religion, Country, all
That deepest, dearest, most enduring be,
That make us noble, and that hold us thrall,
Once gone, the beasts were no more gross than we,—
'Tis these for which the victims fastest fall,
Man's self, in days that are as days that were,
Suppliant alike and executioner!

CXLVIII.

“Now once again this tragedy, this jar
Of conscience against conscience, hath, meseems,
In Paris struck the flinty flame of war.
Likely, they slay for straws, they die for dreams.
But things that seem must still be things that are
To half-experienced man, who perforce deems
He doth not dream, but knows not, nor can know,
Till death brings sleep or waking, is it so.

CXLIX.

“Another dream, another watchword 'tis,
This strident Commune shrills upon the wind,
Which to it Love, Religion, Country, is,—
Level Equality for all Mankind.
Hence once again the man-made bullets whiz
'Gainst man man-made. I can but lag behind,
Sceptic, yet see withal the dupes that die
For falsest faith are somewhat more than I!”

CL.

Thus mournfully he spoke ; then slowly she :
“ I think I understand. But tell me why
Are not the poor content still poor to be,
Since mainly 'twas for them that Christ did die ?
And equal ? What is equal ? Are not we
All equal in the great Superior's eye ?
Are they not blest that weep and suffer wrong ?
And is 't not peril to be rich and strong ? ”

CLI.

Out of another world they seemed to come,
These humble words and doctrines obsolete ;
So that their very strangeness made him dumb.
“ Alas ! ” he said at length. “ You but repeat
Saws long rejected by mankind ; though some
Still mumble them, as gasp they towards the seat
Of wealth, or place, or power, as boys bear
Pebble within their mouth, to faster fare.

CLII.

“ Yours, dear, the teaching I myself did learn,
When on my upraised gaze my mother's shone.
I find none better wheresoe'er I turn,
None truer, fitter ! But 'tis gone, clean gone.
Men will not have it so. The candid spurn,
The hypocrite ignore, what children con
Only to find it fable. 'Tis a world,
Where Christ's meek banner longwhile hath been furled.

CLIII.

“Man stands upon the hill-tops in the dawn,
With all life’s mists below him ; and he sees
Only the Heaven of Heavens sublimely drawn
Above him, with its blue immensities.
Slow melt the mists ; then, ’neath him, breadths of lawn,
Forests, and lakes, and many-pastured leas,
Cities and herds of people, labour, mirth,
He scans, and all the kingdoms of the earth.

CLIV.

“O gorgeous vision ! dazzling wonderland !
Swift he descends to share it. Then he hears
Sounds that at first he scarce can understand,
Discords, and taunts, and dismal drip of tears ;
Love sobbing with her fresh gifts in her hand,
Because none takes ; menace, reproaches, jeers ;
Greed munching refuse, jealous to repel ;
And melancholy toll of funeral bell.

CLV.

“Then, desolate of heart, he deems ’twere best
To reascend the hill-tops ; and he goes,
With gaze upon the ground and panting breast.
But, as he mounts, mists round him once more close ;
And when he turns to see if from high crest
Earth still looks fair, it blurred and doubtful grows ;
While now in heaven glooms something dark afar,
Only, with here and there a flickering star.”

CLVI.

He ceased ; and ceased the swishing of the wave,
Which to the end accompanied his speech.
Furled were the sails, and mute the vessel drave,
Through folds of still smooth water, towards the beach.
Olympia to the crew blest rosaries gave,
While Godfrid had a word and vail for each,
As stood they, honest sea-folk, cap in hand.
And then the pair were softly rowed to land.

CLVII.

And soon on roaring wings through burrows black
They were being swiftly borne ; 'twixt towering crags
That seemed to frown on their presumptuous track,
And whither, save the chamois' or the stag's,
No foot hath ever clambered and come back ;
Past gentler cliffs where waved the iris-flags,
And vineyard terraces, that catch the blaze
Of the south sun, with pastures at their base.

CLVIII.

Then imperceptibly the mountains waned
To hills, the gorges unto valleys spread,
The valleys out to plains, and nought remained
Of that fair Italy from which they fled.
Nature grew less, man more, and use profaned
The bare-stripped homes of beauty, as they sped
Past populous cities, level stretch of fields,
Blank as the desert, save for what it yields.

CLIX.

Thus all one day they journeyed, all one night,
Halting but seldom, and with brief delay :
Noting at first,—to both familiar sight,—
The kepi-ed umpires of Mentana's fray,
That changed at length to leathern helmets bright.
Whereat Olympia asked him, "Who be they?"
"These are," he said, "who late from France's hand Struck sword, and now for ransom hold the land."

CLX.

Thence onward saw they sentries none but these,
Then scattered groups of comrades, next close files,
Last, armies, bivouacked 'neath boughs of trees,
Along straight roads that seemed to stretch for miles.
Then Godfrid said : "That Paris is, one sees
Where lights begin to twinkle in long aisles.
We shall be there ere long. And just as night
O'ermastered day, they halted, to alight.

CLXI.

Straight towards her bourne, through many a dim-lit street,
Her he conducted, till at length they stood
Before its portal. Then for journey sweet
He thanked her, adding that he shortly should
Unto the Convent re-direct his feet,
To see the Mother of the sisterhood.
Then the gate opened ; and she, paler grown,
Passed in, and he was in the street alone.

CLXII.

Then quick his steps he bent through narrow ways,
Built in the times when grew up side by side
Palace and hovel, and in all men's gaze
Sleek splendour feasted while lean misery died,
To those famed thoroughfares, with lights ablaze,
Far-stretching, vast, monotonous in pride,
Imperial ædiles framed, to baulk the claws
Of Freedom, and replace its ravished laws.

CLXIII.

But siege, and sordid famine, and the yoke
Of foeman's fork, humiliation, rage
At turncoat Fortune's contumelious stroke,
Iconoclastic group, had swept the stage
Of pasteboard pomp ; and erst where harlot folk,
Train-bearing eunuchs to a sensual age,
Pandars, and purple parasites that glut
Their maw with slaver, used to swarm and strut ;

CLXIV.

And lustful songs and jests obscene passed round,
And sexless things, with faces falsely fresh,
And cold limbs feigning wantonness, were crowned
By senile satyrs, as they wove the mesh
Of palsy premature o'er young and sound,
Ere haggling for the price of rented flesh ;
While jingling gold, and sniggering mock, and gird
At God and man, in unison were heard ;—

CLXV.

Hence now had sneaked the comfortable crew ;
Or if one slunk along with eyes askance,
He strove to make him viewless to the view,
And, crawling to his hole, there bide till chance
The days for warm-furred vermin should renew.
There was no light lewd song, no pornic dance.
The streets seemed half-ashamed and half-aghast,
And night's sparse lamps blinked drowsy as he passed.

CLXVI.

What few here held the ways were those whose tramp
Held it as victors : proletarian hordes,
Scared modern opulence still strains to cramp
Upon the frontiers penury affords ;
Driving them back to their own barbarous camp
With the unsteady aid of hireling swords,
Or coaxing them with golden bounties lest
They should swarm down, and rudely seize the rest.

CLXVII.

But these had broken through the flimsy line
Of strained Civilization, and now strode,
Grim apparitions,—'mongst its dainties fine
And gauds abandoned making their abode,
And littering all the spot, like bristly swine,
Where lately lay its lapdogs, snugly stowed ;
And twisting to stern needs of force and fear
Its gilded toys, soft beds, and silken gear.

CLXVIII.

These ever and anon his footsteps stayed,
With short sharp challenge. Whereupon he told
His simple tale, and asked if they could aid
His quest of friends who fought within their fold.
Some bade him pass ; some churlish answer made,
Some courteous ; none gave tidings that consoled.
And fitful throat afar from sleepless bed
Bellowed, and whistling missile burst o'erhead.

CLXIX.

With dawn he was afoot, and searching where
Gilbert and Miriam might be found ; since they Gave in their letter, save the tidings bare
They were in Paris, nought to guide his way.
So "Poste Restante," he answered. Wending there,
He found his letter still unasked-for lay ;
Nor could those questioned lend him trace or clue
To their abode, whose very names none knew.

CLXX.

Then, wandering forth, he spoke with all he met,
Of likely mien, among the jealous crowd
Of strange lank faces : sons of grime and sweat,
Who, wielding now war's tools, in tatters proud
Lined barricade, or leaned 'gainst parapet,
As watchdog fort 'gainst watchdog fort bayed loud,
All round the rim of struggle, and the growl
Of surly death made April's fair day foul.

CLXXI.

Some scanned him with suspicious, hateful eyes,
Since in each lineament, soft-curving jaw,
Lithe gait, fair garb, slow questions, calm replies,
Hands that ne'er grasped or trowel, file, or saw,
A son of those cursed sires they viewed, whose cries
Of need or menace to their sires were law,
In days when these drew water and hewed wood,
And men to men denied their brotherhood.

CLXXII.

And some, lest they should smite him, turned on heel,
And spat a curse upon the ground; while some
Pushed him aside with curt retort of steel.
Whereat, for very sadness, he was dumb;
Well knowing in his heart that he could feel
Most woefully for woe, past or to come,
And the sole privilege he prized or sought
Was power to cure the wrongs that others wrought.

CLXXIII.

Then elsewhere would he ply his anxious search;
At palace or at prefecture, in which
Imperial symbols, marred by stroke and smirch,
Had yielded up unstable honour's niche
To Phrygian goddess; now, at bare-stripped church,
Where erstwhile knelt the swathed and scented rich,
But whither now, rough-elbowing their way,
Tatterdemalions thronged, though not to pray.

CLXXIV.

Could they not tell him of the pair he sought?—
An English comrade with Italian mate,
Who to their cause the blended tribute brought
Of Northern valour spurred by Southern hate?
No ; and still no : though, here and there one thought
That he had seen such twain, but not of late.
And these with the uncertain accents spake
Which the heart's doubts but yet more doubting make.

CLXXV.

At length one,—then another,—then a third,—
Sware to have seen them : a most goodly pair,
She lustrous-dark as plume of ebon bird,
He blond, robust, with grizzled beard and hair.
But nought of either had they seen or heard,
Since Paris, first aroused, had from its lair
Burst out, on myrmidons of priest and king
Leaping, to rend, and—curse on't !—missed its spring.

CLXXVI.

Further, none helped him. But, desisting not,
Still to his search he eachwhere craved reply ;
Till he was greeted by a scowling knot
With "See his Teuton face ! A spy ! A spy !"
Whereat armed rabble shuffled to the spot,
And loud reviled him. But with quiet eye
And front he scanned them, as in Delian wood
Apollo 'mong the satyrs might have stood.

CLXXVII.

To base gesticulation, wordy spite,
Mute he remained, and but surveyed them still
From the lone perch of sorrow's fearless height :
Affronting by confronting them, until,
Like hounds that egg each other on to bite
By barking, clamour giving heart to kill,
Closer they hemmed him, and ferocious made
By their own throats, their hands upon him laid.

CLXXVIII.

Then because blood heats quickly, he, unarmed,
Flashed them aside, and as the foremost fell,
The rest shrank back that lately round him swarmed,
And clear he stood, still ready to repel.
Yet not for long his mien their rage had charmed,
But that more swift than pen or tongue can tell,
One hustled to the front, and ere the crowd
Could set its teeth afresh, exclaimed aloud :

CLXXIX.

“ Hold, citizens ! This man is Freedom's friend,
Of English stock, no Teuton, and no spy.
I saw him at Mentana rout and rend
The Pope-King's wolves. You doubt it ? Well then, try ! ”
Then turning quick to Godfrid, “ Pray, sir, lend
Best confirmation that I do not lie.
Show them your breast ! I know the foeman's steel
There gashed a rent that ne'er will wholly heal.”

CLXXX.

"Good comrade!" Godfrid said, "I scarce recall
Your Southern face; yet what you say is so,
And yours the land I have loved best of all,
After my own. My breast I need not show.
The thrust you speak of when you saw me fall,
Hath left its brand. Enough for these to know
I say it; and what wounds I feel or felt,
Fighting for Freedom, their compatriots dealt."

CLXXXI.

"Not ours!" they loud protested, timely shame
Awaking chivalry; "not Frenchmen those,
No countrymen of ours! And in the name
Of France we hail you friend and them as foes.
But since for you hath Freedom's mountain flame
Once served for rousing beacon, how is't glows
Its watchfire now in vain, and that you stand,
There, with no answering weapon in your hand?"

CLXXXII.

"See! here are arms! Quick! don them, and come fight
For Cause far purer than you yet have known,
That of Mankind and Universal Right!"
But he forbore to take them, and with tone,
Strange contrast unto theirs, said, "Would I might!
But if I cannot make your thoughts my own,
How can I, honest, share your sword, and strike,
For striking's sake, at foe and friend alike?"

CLXXXIII.

“Forgive me ! I to neither camp belong.
But, brothers mine, I fear you miss your way,
Aiming at too much right through too much wrong.”
“Pah ! ’tis a casuist,” some began to say ;
“Wails with the weak, but battens with the strong,
And takes a brief alike from night and day :”
While others sneered, “Do whelps belie their bed ?
Look at his smooth white hands and dainty head !”

CLXXXIV.

Withal, they let him pass. Then with fresh thanks,
In the soft Southern tongue, to him who had
Thus timely aided, by the river’s banks
He went and wandered, plunged in musings sad,
Yet feeding fast the hope that from these ranks
Of doomed indiscipline, no longer mad,
Gilbert and Miriam had withdrawn, and now
Were seeking him with homewards-cleaving prow.

CLXXXV.

So on the morrow, fourth day from that eve
He for Olympia had her Convent found,
Thither once more, no longer loth to leave
A seeming idle quest, at noon he wound.
But now he wore, conspicuous round his sleeve,
A blood-red Cross upon a snow-white ground ;
Emblem and shield, through fratricidal fray,
Of those who stanch the blood they cannot stay.

CLXXXVI.

Into its sacred precincts free he passed,
And by the Lady Abbess straight was met.
"Welcome, my son!" she said. "I hope at last
You have found your friends." "No, Mother! not as yet;
Though I begin to hope they must have cast
Their madness from them, and their steps have set
Back to that land from which, it seems, you know,
I brought your daughter dear, four days ago."

CLXXXVII.

"Yes, I know all, my son! and thank you much;
As doth she also. But is 't true you mean
To stay amongst us, who indeed for such
Are sorely pressed? For never have I seen
Maimed sin so sorely needing pity's crutch."
"Yes, Mother!" answered he; "you rightly glean
The purport of my badge. But who will show
My unskilled hands how best to wait on woe?"

CLXXXVIII.

"We will, my son! right thankful for the aid
Of your strong arms. Rough offices there be,
For which our poor frail sisters are not made,
But want the prop of manly charity.
The struck, from where they fall, must be conveyed
From reach of fire, the dying borne where, free
From noise of carnage, they with God may speak:—
Help, which to give, you only have to seek."

CLXXXIX.

So it was ordered he should daily come,
Soon after sunrise, to the Convent yard,
Where, of the sisters, would be always some
Ready to start for rampart, gate, or ward.
And henceforth, every morn, at roll of drum,
With them he sallied forth, a constant guard,
Doing their hests till fire and fight grew slack
Towards dusk, then led them to their cloister back.

CXC.

Most times Olympia came, and with her one,
Now two, now more, but not unoft alone,
Since that, in pairs, the work could best be done ;
And thus, ere long, it had to custom grown
They should together start at rise of sun,
Together find the spot where gash and moan
Craved pity's presence most, together learn
To-morrow's post, together should return.

CXCI.

Oftenest their steps were bent—since loudest there
Was heard the awakening cannon's surly sound,—
Along the way presumptuous fribbles dare
To call Elysian, past the boastful ground
Where slaughter's storied Arch confronts the air,
And splendour's palaced alleys radiate round,
Which house new wealth's gross pomp and surfeit sleep,
Onwards to Neuilly's gate and Maillot's sweep.

CXCII.

Here, since that fatal foray, when the swarm
Of ill-led labour, trusting to the sting
Of venom'd hate, had sallied forth to storm
The hold of priest, and plutocrat, and king,
Despair had ta'en, with undespairing form,
Its stoutest stand, and sibilating wing
Swooped through the air incessantly, and struck
Sharply the prey as yet it could not pluck.

CXCIII.

And there, 'mid hiss of shell, and quick hot hail
That was its own unwarning messenger,
Oft minding of Mentana's closing tale,
Godfrid moved active, followed still by her
As by wan shadow ; she composed but pale,
He flushed, as one whom curbed-in instincts spur,
And whose majestic port seemed far more fit
To lead to carnage than to wait on it.

CXCIV.

Full many a task of tenderness was theirs,
And many a one of terror ; florid boys,
Who should have tending been eld's silvering hairs,
And lived their fathers' props, their mothers' joys ;
Manhood, with which chaste wisdom seemliest pairs ;
And cramped age, best aloof from strife and noise ;
Together mangled, and whose bootless pain
Made youth seem old, age childish, prime insane.

CXCv.

Some with locked lips and gloomy-puckered brow,
In anguish resolute, their service bore
Silent, as though nought served or mattered now.
Some their own wounds, and smart, and dripping gore,
Forgot, and kept on babbling grateful vow ;
While some on their pale dark-framed faces wore
Faint smile, like sickly gleam one sometimes sees
On the dying year's white fields and bare black trees.

CXCvI.

Others there were who, helpless, help repelled,
And would not quit the fray, but stock or blade
With very death-throes clutched, and, dead, still held.
Many shrieked loud for, then rejected, aid,
Seeing Olympia's garb, and foully yelled,
Though harmless by her innocence made,
Their blasphemies obscene, which, had not death,
Must Godfrid's self have made, their latest breath.

CXCvII.

Some, tenderer, kissed her hand, and kissing died,
And some e'en took the crucifix she pressed
Upon their lips, and touched Christ's sin-speared side :
'Chance, since first faith in that last hour seemed best,
'Chance but because she could not be denied
Who had such gentle hand, such loving breast.
But others thrust it off, and her, and tore
Their flesh, cursed man and God, and spoke no more.

CXCVIII.

At times a sullen unexpected lull
On the demoniac din awhile would fall,
Fierce-baying fort growl low, and then grow dull,
And rifle-rattle cease from ditch and wall.
Then Godfrid and Olympia, glad to cull
A passing respite from the thick of brawl,
As in the happier days, their wallets shared
Under some new-leafed tree rage yet had spared.

CXCIX.

Then, seizing the brief chance, the birds would sing
Their love-songs in the branches of young May,
And round the cannon's jaws and cold bright ring,
Grimly reposing, butterflies would play,
Sipping the sun, at peace with everything.
The fumes of mortal fury rolled away,
Leaving the blue heavens bare, till half-closed eyes
Might deem the earth as happy as the skies.

CC.

And Godfrid, pointing through the shimmering air,
Shimmering and still, would say, "Look, sister mine!
Doth not Valérien, perched up peaceful there,
Remind you often of the Aventine?
One well might deem it, too, a hill of prayer.
Il Priorato's convent walls, the shrine
Of Sant' Alessio, and—there! leftwards, see
Sabina's Church, with Dominic's lemon-tree!"

CCI.

But, as he pointed, lo ! quick puff of smoke,
And, in it, for an instant, flash of light,
And loud the claustral-seeming fortress spoke,
Bellowing its summons to renew the fight.
Then straight each dozing throat of war awoke,
And hoarse bayed back ; while muskets' mongrel spite,
At the big war-dogs' signal to begin,
With short sharp yaps accompanied the din.

CCII.

Then Godfrid and Olympia started up,
As May's sweet birds crouched silent, prompt to lend
Once more the helping hand, the timely cup.
But when day's ending brought awhile to end
This daily rage, and, homewards bound to sup,
Would the unwounded in disorder wend,
As each one willed, he oft sought news again
Of Gilbert, questioning knots of armed men.

CCIII.

One eve when fight had even fiercer been
Than its fierce wont, and vantage had been gained
At point the assailants long had strained to win,
A stripling, with the day's work smoked and stained,
Of Gascon speech, blue eyes, and tawny skin,
Hearing him put the questions some disdained,
Some could not answer, forward pushed, and said,
" That pair are 'mong the captive or the dead.

CCIV.

“Stalwart, intrepid, fair,—I mind them well,
And saw them with these eyes, that morn accurst,
When ruin-lured by treachery or by hell,
We from yet open city pell-mell burst
To strangle wrong. Know you where Flourens fell,
Gay, gallant Flourens, of the foremost first?
There, in the river’s bend I saw them both,—
Have seen not since.” Then with a guttural oath,

CCV.

Which every throat around took up ;—a deep
Chorus of curses,—“You may stay your search,”
He laughed aloud ; “they have been drugged to sleep
With leaden dose, their backs against a church.”
Then others growled : “Why on your left arm keep
That tame badge, leaving vengeance in the lurch?
Grasp with the right, man ! if you want to aid,
Not the smooth scalpel, but the jagged blade.”

CCVI.

Thereon he turned away, and strode along,
She at his side ; both, though perturbed with fear,
Striving with help of silence to be strong.
But when they reached the Convent, and could hear
The nuns within, singing the even-song,
He stopped, and white-lipped said : “To-morrow, dear,
I cannot come with you. I must pass out
Straight to Versailles, and solve this dreadful doubt.”

CCVII.

Just then a half-intoxicated band
Trolled by, and mocked her with a gesture foul,
She saw not, seeing would not understand,
And passed within. But Godfrid, with a scowl
Of startled ire and ready-flashing hand,
Rolled two in mire ; whose comrades with a growl
Of sottish rage, their pieces cocked and raised
Against him and each other, drunk and dazed.

CCVIII.

Swift as the lightning leaps from unguessed sheath,
A blade was flashed on high, then swooping down,
Scaring and scattering backwards those beneath,
Swept space for Godfrid, while each stumbling clown
Muttered a muzzy curse betwixt his teeth.
“ Away, ye sots ! ye blots on our renown !
Is this a time to hiccup and carouse ?
Hence home ! and hide in sleep your shameless brows ! ”

CCIX.

Cowed, they slunk off ; and, before Godfrid, stood
Gilbert and Miriam both ! both, quick embraced
In the wide-opening arms of brotherhood :
One closely curved round Miriam’s nestling waist,
She the while babbling all the joy she could,
The other upon Gilbert’s shoulder placed
With firm fond grip ; each gazing upon each,
But all alike yet mendicants for speech.

CCX.

'Twas Godfrid first found words to tell his tale,
Quickly as words could say it : how he came
Thither from Italy with prosperous sail,
Olympia's escort, cherishing the aim
To find them, but till then without avail ;
How he felt sure, since none had heard their name,
They had gone homewards,—till that eve, with dread,
News he had heard, to fear them ta'en or dead.

CCXI.

“ No fabled news ! Your Gascon lad spoke true.
We but an hour ago re-passed the wall
Though which we sallied, an o'er-motley crew,
A wasted month since. We saw Flourens fall.
My turn came next, though I was but struck through
The foot and lamed. But we contrived to crawl
'Mong tall thick river-canes, and, crouched from sight,
There passed a dripping day and famished night.

CCXII.

“ Neither upon the morrow might we move ;
For we could hear the foe's feet all around,
Prowling 'mong copse and brushwood-bank, to prove
If living thing still lurked upon the ground :
And oft would bullet cleave a clean straight groove
Through the dense cane-stems with a swishing sound,
We lying close, and praying, scarcely loth,
The ball that found out one would find out both.

CCXIII.

“ We sucked the sedge-roots, munched the river-thyme,
And kissed each other sadly. In mid night,
From ooze our limbs we lifted for a time,
But durst not sleep ; and with first feint of light,
Down dropped we once again in the dank slime,
Whose rustling osiers thrilled us oft with fright,
And listened eyefully, then chewed again,
Towards eve, the acrid cresses of the fen.

CCXIV.

“ On the third morning we no more heard steel
Beating the coverts ; but we still lay close.
For I was helpless yet with smarting heel,
And with long hunger numb and comatose.
Then Miriam crept along, and scraped a meal
From field hard by, of roots and refuse gross,—
What she could find,—and thus for two days more,
What flesh and blood, at bay, can bear, we bore.

CCXV.

“ And these revived me, and our watery bed,
Cooling the bandaged wound, made dead the pain.
And when the fifth night deepened overhead,
We stole from cover, with intent to gain
A lowly roof whose windows seemed to shed
The nearest light to us. But 'twas in vain.
I limped, and crawled, and halted ; so that when
We were but half there, night withdrew again.

CCXVI.

“So in a deep dry ditch we had to crouch
Through the slow tedious daylight ; thankful, though,
To find at last, if hard, not humid couch,
And, as the dusk lagged nearer, whispering low
One to the other, asking who could vouch
That we should knock at door of friend, not foe ;
Still, weary caution turning desperate,
Revolved that night to stake our lives on fate.

CCXVII.

“But what an endless tale ! as long as were
Those nights and days that came, withal, to end.
Now, thanks once more to Miriam’s craft and care,
And subtle help of friend succeeding friend,
I hale am yet again, and here to share
Defence’s bitter dregs, or, should Heaven send
New hope to our extreme, with breast as meet
To swim to victory as to stem defeat !

CCXVIII.

“Plague on the long lost weeks, wherein I lay
At Suresnes, then at Courbevoie, hearing still
The cannon bellow and the bugle bray,
My listening weakness chafing ’gainst my will.
I convalescent days since, but to-day
We slipped the lines, and more by luck than skill ;
For though the bloodhounds failed to do us hurt,
They put their fangs, you see, through Miriam’s skirt.”

CCXIX.

“A tasteless morsel!” Miriam laughing said,
Spreading the riddled folds ; as Godfrid drew
Her arm through his, and, Gilbert following, led
Along the pavements, trodden now by few,
Towards his own hearth. “Come, I have board and bed
For both, if rough ; not rough perhaps to you,
My dauntless Miriam, and your wounded wight.
Come, Gilbert ! You are mine, at least to-night.”

CCXX.

Thus strolling on, he sought, in leisured walk,
To scan both closely, but the while to hide
His anxious scrutiny with cheerful talk :
Fancying, withal, in Gilbert he descried
A generous plant which, flowering, runs to stalk,
A lavish stream whose bed is well-nigh dried
By its too copious flowing, a quick fire
Burnt by the very wind of its desire.

CCXXI.

Barely eight months had left on him the score
Of more than twice eight years. He stood erect,
Limping but little, and his body bore
No brand of age, still goodly to inspect.
But jaw and temples wolfish lankness wore,
And in his fitful eyes you could detect
Less light than lightning ; slumberous, lurid-browed ;
Save when they flashed, as dull as thunder-cloud.

CCXXII.

He looked a nobler and completer type
Of those one saw around ; who, because he
Was nobler, could more keenly feel the stripe
Of contumelious destiny, and be
For madness and for misery yet more ripe :
Like them, by war, and want, and gloomy glee
Of vain resistance, famine, failure, hate,
Fevered to fiery point prescribed by Fate.

CCXXIII.

She was less changed, and change in her had wrought
But summer's growth of loveliness ; for though
Her steps had been with those that phrensied fought,
Hers still was woman's work ; to come or go,
As Gilbert swayed. And so she had but caught
From this weird hour the purple-crimson glow
That comes upon dark streams when red suns set,
And day and night at twilight tryst have met.

CCXXIV.

Once round his board, then craftily he strove
Thence to transport towards Italy, with speech
Which, nearer theme and thought eschewing, wove,
Far-off but well within affection's reach,
A glowing tale of how the dear land throve,
And hinting how it needed still from each
Who loved it still, exclusive heart and soul ;—
Keeping it wholesome, having made it whole.

CCXXV.

Close-watching if their blood were taking fire,
In hers he plainly could infection trace,
And marked her quickly glance, as though to inquire
Of Gilbert ; who, like one that lends his face,
But hath elsewhere his ear and his desire,
Sate cold as listening statue in his place :
Whereat the flush died palely on her cheek ;
And then he knew that he in vain would speak,

CCXXVI.

Then still avoiding discord and distress,
He lured discourse, with subtly-wandering wing,
To ruins softened by the sun's caress ;
Saying at length : " Will you, dear Miriam, sing
One of those songs of love and simpleness,
Such as in happy Capri often ring
Up goat-browsed clefts. Whereat, without stringed aid,
In her own tongue she sang this serenade. .

I.

Sleep ! lady fair !

O but thy couch should be
The fleeci^{est} cloudlet of the summer air,
The softest billow of the summer sea,
Or that unforsaken nest
I keep warm in my true breast,
For thee, for thee !

2.

Dream, lady sweet !

The moon and planets bright
Now thread thy slumbers with unsounding feet,
Now drench thy fancies with unshaped delight :
As my spirit fain would steep
Thine, when only half asleep,
This night, this night !

3.

Wake, lady mine !

See ! are awake the flowers,
Their opening cusps bright tipped with dewy wine,
And, buoyed on song, the moist lark trills and towers.
Wake ! If thou must be away,
Nightly, let at least the day
Be ours, be ours !

CCXXVII.

Discordant with the gently closing notes,
A swelling roar of demon music stormed
The night without, growled by a thousand throats,
Hoarse, hirsute, raggèd, in armed phalanx formed
Round wain designed for autumn's sickled oats,
Now piled with human forms life lately warmed,
Death-blanchèd and bloodless, swaying with each jar,
And jolted by each jolt, of the rude car.

CCXXVIII.

And, guttering in the smoked air, torches flared
Full on their upturned faces ; clotted beard,
Limp necks, dead-weighted arms, and breasts half-bared,
Feet with the blood they fell and died in smeared,
And lidless eyes that saw not but still stared,—
Blind-orbed, mute-mouthed, dull-nostrilled, and deaf-eared :
While with notes deep as sullen-sounding surge,
The tramping mourners trolled this vengeful dirge.

I.

Wake ! ye proletarian numbers ! Who is he that basely
cumbers
With untimely-wallowing slumbers the embattlemented ground ?
Hark ! they press around the city, without respite, without pity,
Chanting loud the insulting ditty their lewd fathers loved to sound.

2.

Still they take their wanton pleasure, in the rifling of your treasure,
And they dance the jocund measure to the chorus of your groans ;
Have baptized in perfumed waters the dishonour of your daughters,
And upraised upon your slaughters the vile splendour of their thrones !

3.

What ! shall yours but be their fiat of lean order, cringing quiet.
As they revel, roll, and riot, in their frippery and gold !
And the mincing eunuch-varlet, in embroidery and scarlet,
Tends some dainty-bedded harlot, a lamb ravished from your fold !

4.

Shall their pomp for ever flutter, past the palely gleaming shutter,
Where the sordid candles gutter, by cold hearth and meagre board ?
Quick to arms ! ye sons of labour ! Shrill the trumpet, beat the tabour !
And confront the clanking sabre with the cleaving of the sword !

5.

Rise, O people ! in your anger, to extinguish with your clangour
The sleek-surpliced hired haranguer, who would wed you to your chains ;
And in tones of thunderous candour, tell priest, prostitute, and pandar,
They no more your bread shall squander on stews, palaces, and fanés !

6.

Wave on high, then, wave the torches ! Let us fire their gilded porches,
Till the red fire licks and scorches what they plundered from our sweat !
And when low they kneel and grovel, the lank starvelings of the hovel
Their charred carcasses may shovel to the places men forget !

CCXXIX.

Thus o'er the stony street the exposed dead,
Dirged by the living, vengeful moved along :
Godfrid with folded arms and downcast head,
Gilbert, stern-hearkening to the chanted wrong,
Miriam, heart-torn 'twixt sympathy and dread,
Each gazing down upon the marching throng.
Which passed, they nothing said, since each one guessed
The other's thoughts, and straight retired to rest.

CCXXX.

But when, afresh, ebb'd darkness' covering tide,
And dainty winds, handmaidens of the morn,
Blew the light curtains of the sun aside,
Godfrid, obeying silent mandate born
Of sleepy hours that had all sleep denied,
Girded his constancy for hope forlorn,
And, after greetings such as host to guest
Blends with good-morrow, Gilbert thus addressed.

CCXXXI.

“ I came to drag you hence, and lead you back
To Rome or Capri, but myself have here
Found what, you know, 'twas long my grief to lack,
A task I can accept, a path to steer
Which doth not seem a wholly bootless track,
And, were it bootless, I with one most dear
Traverse, and fain would spend my remnant life
Humbly assisting her to soften strife.

CCXXXII.

“Look ! I will leave her. Heaven to her will see
Better than I can. I will ring the knell
Of one more hope, so only you will flee
From this inhuman travesty of hell.
O Gilbert ! Gilbert ! It can never be
That waters of sweet brotherhood will well
From such a bitter source, or freedom flood
Springs that are soaked with hate and choked with blood !

CCXXXIII.

“Each sanguinary second drips with gore,
Each horrid hour strikes death ! The ravening band
Who round the gate of counsel surging roar,
Now urge the Commune’s hesitating hand
To slay the Hostages ; who never bore
Weapon more warlike than the crosier bland,
Or sacrificial chalice ; whose gray hair
And fenceless breasts might tigers tempt to spare !”

CCXXXIV.

“Spare !” flashed out Gilbert. “Spared they will be, though
They live and league with those that never spared,
Feeding from palms that fatten on the woe
Of millions not less blameless or gray-haired.
What ! are they monsters, to strike blow for blow,
Such fiends, because, for æons having bared
Their bleeding backs to bide affliction’s brunt,
Now from their knees they leap, and show their front ? †

CCXXXV.

“Would you have serfs of centuries to learn
The use of Freedom’s gentle weapons straight?
The worm is trodden still, that will not turn;
And mercy wins by bruising head of hate.
Did you bid Italy but whine and yearn,
Feebly forbearing, lest the robber’s pate
Should feel the sword-stroke that sliced off his Crown?
No! but you out with blade, and clove him down!

CCXXXVI.

“Say! were we all, all tuned to wisdom’s harp,
All chivalric and just, and did we pause
To scan the handle so the point was sharp,
When we chased wolves from Italy? Satin paws
Suit well the hearth of peace. O, you may carp!
But when war bade you spring, the sharp-curved claws
Were quick forthcoming. Ours shall seek their sheath,
When Wealth hath sloughed its fangs and shed its teeth!”

CCXXXVII.

“Truce, Gilbert! truce to bootless argument,
Which, proving nought, enforceth everything.
The fault was mine, though not the rash intent
To play the umpire ’twixt the iron ring
And that round which ’tis resolutely bent.
Each hour it on you closes, and you fling
Your life to foredoomed failure, if you stay
Till the thin space between hath waned away.

CCXXXVIII.

“Nay, hear me out! You shall surrender not
To fate, but friendship! Give your sword to me,
Who back will hand it once we shall have got
Out of this tangle, and can clearer see
Our way to mend man’s miserable lot.
Oh! save you think me craven, do not be
Vexed with the voice which bids true courage dare
Fly from the shore of obstinate despair!”

CCXXXIX.

Thus as he pleaded, Miriam mutely stole
To Gilbert’s side; and as one oft may see
A russet fawn against the tall gray bole
Of pendent ash, straining to draw the tree
Down to itself, so now with upturned soul
And hands up-creeping to his bosom, she
Laboured to bend him, saying soft and slow:
“Godfrid is right. Yes, Gilbert! let us go!”

CCXL.

He put her from him gently, and his brow
Gathered with pain. Then he said gravely, “Go!
Go both! ’twere best so. Godfrid! you know how
To guard my bliss while I stay here with woe.
Yes, go! But I—I cannot leave them now.
And ’chance”—— But ere another word could flow,
She, crying, “Gilbert, hush! you hurt my ears!”
Muffled his mouth with kisses dashed by tears.

CCXLI.

So nothing more was said, and all remained :
Gilbert and Miriam hastening to the front,
While Godfrid, past the punctual hour detained
When with Olympia he was daily wont
To sally from the Convent, slowly gained
The splendid ways where filth now loved to shunt
Splendour aside, and penury in steel
Past pomp's gold lintels strode with clanking heel.

CCXLII.

The air seemed thronged with voices, and the street
With an unusual concourse that converged
On, though unmarshalled, yet consentient feet,
As by preparatory watchword urged,
To the famed point where separate roadways meet,
Then flow, made one, towards square where He who scourged
The world with whips of war, on column high
Stands robed, and boastfully confronts the sky.

CCXLIII.

His right hand still for sceptre Victory grasped,
The spiky laurel-wreath still girt his brow,
Sedate as though no hearts e'er groaned or gasped
That he might keep Ambition's bloody vow.
But round the Imperial throat was tightly clasped
The hangman's rope, about the purple now
Was coiled coarse cordage, and blank scaffoldings
Hid the bronzed vaunt of trampled States and kings.

CCXLIV.

Under it swarmed a swaying multitude,
Clamouring that it be levelled with the ground,
Its soaring majesty in mire imbrued,
And haughty silence bend to crashing sound.
“Death !” loud they cried, “Death to the vampires lewd,
Death and dishonour to the Cæsars crowned,
Whose eagles rob the ring-dove’s brood, and store
Carnivorous eyries with the ewe-lamb’s gore !

CCXLV.

“Dishonour, death, and degradation’s heel
Stamp on the neck of prostrate conquerors,
Who yoked our sires to battle’s blood-splashed wheel,
And to death’s gap with sportive Glory’s spurs
Urged their bestridden carcasses. Let them reel
From their high pedestals, night-prowling curs
Nose in their entrails, and Power’s levelled lust
Lie with its face on undelightful dust !”

CCXLVI.

Thus plied they the deaf thing with curse and hoot,
Which, when it fell not, swelled to growling mock.
Whereat loose chains through pulleys ’gan to shoot ;
And as the trunk and unlopped branches rock
Of a huge elm axe-severed at the root,
Then lurch, ere headlong toppling, with the shock
To gash the turf,—so it with creaking sound
Began to sway, preparing for the ground.

CCXLVII.

Then down it plunged ; but, as it plunged, it snapped
To fragments in mid air, and scattering fell
With a crash, as when the heavens are thunder-clapped,
That seemed to wake in nether-listening hell
Echoes of demon laughter hoarse and apt.
Then silence rose, as when some criminal,
Shamed of his life, hath with self's hand bereft
Life of its shame, and there is nothing left.

CCXLVIII.

But with deep mock of devils mock of men
Was lightly mingled : them who bounded 'neath
The knightly stirrup, and straight halted when
They felt the snaffle tightened 'twixt their teeth ;
Whose mettle, trained by discipline, could then
Be with slack bridle loosed o'er hill and heath,
Vineyard and foddered city, pasture, all
That tempts the unruly, yet be checked at call.

CCXLIX.

And these, the vassals of obedience,
Victorious lord for whom none vainly bleed,
The northern heights of Paris held, and thence
Saw with glad hearts the suicidal deed.
For time had been, when theirs the vain defence
'Gainst these who had vain defended, through like need
Of serried ranks, but whose recorded shame
Fell with the falling column's broken fame.

CCL.

But madness, ever maddened more by sight
Of its destructive handiwork, now seemed
Possessed by mere iconoclastic spite,
Which 'gainst itself, as others, raged and schemed.
That done by day was safe undone at night,
Those trusted now, then quick were traitors deemed ;
Counsel was torn in twain, though each a head
Seemed to retain, by blind worm motions led.

CCLI.

Sneaking suspicion, ever at the ear
Of vigilant insanity, inflamed
The rancour of its brain with furious fear.
Some it denounced, others but whispering named
With finger on tight lip, lest they should hear,
And 'scape from vengeance. Energy was lamed
Just as it started, hurrying valour tripped,
And rich resource of last resources stripped.

CCLII.

And nearer, narrower, closed the iron ring
Round them,—compacter, stronger, as it shrank ;
To desperation's ever shortening spring
Presenting stouter barrier, front and flank.
One gap there was : but this the Teuton King
Held for his own, and with the sabre's clank,
Valid as though 'twere waved on high to strike,
Warned off besiegers and besieged alike.

CCLIII.

Now not by day alone, but night and day,
Springing, recoiling, red throat dogs of war
Kept up their hoarse but unexhausted bay,
By morn, noon, night, sunlight, or moon, or star.
Over the crouching city fiery spray
Was by the flashing tide's advancing jar
With rhythmical recurrence flung, and fell
With deadly plash on vainly-flying yell.

CCLIV.

Bewildered pity, like perplexed defence,
Distracted by ubiquitous distress,
Now to this point, now that, now there, now thence,
Hurried, to find the need of succour less
Than there beyond, and there e'en less intense
Than at fresh spot of death and wretchedness ;
Then, since 'twas vain to seek where woe was worst,
Halted, and, deaf to summons, knelt and nursed.

CCLV.

And Godfrid and Olympia, still close-bound
By their and others' sorrow, moved intent
On lulling anguish, wheresoe'er 'twas found,
And finding it, alas ! where'er they went.
For slaughter seemed to spring from out the ground,
And wounds and wailing from some secret vent
Of Heaven's down-poured : their wedded help, withal,
Not spent but strengthened by woe's constant call.

CCLVI.

But not for shriek of jaggy-tattered flesh,
Nor fratricidal hurricane, did Spring
Fail day by day to wax more blithe and fresh.
In all the branches full-fledged May did sing,
Caught the light-flitting winds in flowery mesh,
And poured its spreading smile o'er everything :
Growing in loveliness, like some fair child
Reared amid sin, but by it undefiled.

CCLVII.

Now scared no longer by the bellowing quake
Of fulgurating smoke, in gardened streets
Bold birds descanted gleeful pipe and shake,
And you could catch their love-notes 'twixt the beats
Of hate's quick, thunderous pulse. Syringa's flake,
Laburnum's golden chains, the lilac's sweets,
Hanging unheeded o'er each vacant bench,
Mingled their perfume with war's sulphurous stench.

CCLVIII.

"O that we were in some sweet shut-in valley,"
Loud, once in momentary lull, he sighed,
"Where orchards bloom, and runnels swift that sally
From far-up clefts in sheltering mountain side,
Trip smiling past the door of pine-wood chalet ;
Where cattle-bells make music far and wide,
Where pale-blue crocuses the green meads dapple,
And I could build you, dear, another chapel."

CCLIX.

“O yes!” she cried. “Or rather that we were Back, back at Spiaggiascura! ’Tis, you know,
The Month of Mary, and is no one there
To give her of the round thorn’s blossoming snow,
To scour the hill for cyclamens, to bear
Jonquil, and rose, and all sweet things that blow,
To her immaculate feet, and never cease
Importuning her ears for love and peace.

CCLX.

“But this will soon be over, will it not?”
Gravely she asked. “Yes, very soon!” he said.
And as he said it, through his heart there shot
The unhallowed thought that when no more the dead
And dying linked his life with hers, his lot
Would be once more this circling world to tread
Alone, without her! and it then required
All virtue’s will to wish the strife expired.

CCLXI.

“And those you love?” she added. “What of them?”
Meaning thereby, as well he understood,
Gilbert and Miriam. “I as lief might stem,”
He answered sadly, “ocean at its flood,
As them withstand. Yet, let us not condemn.
They think they die for human brotherhood.
So far, their lives seemed charmed.” “Heaven grant they may Still be!” she said. “For both, our Sisters pray.”

CCLXII.

She face to face with neither had been brought,
Since that he daily studied to evade,
With false male instinct, meeting none had sought,
And, happening, woman's tact had simple made.
Yet kept he closest watch where Gilbert fought
And Miriam followed, by the trusty aid
Of eyes well paid, and bound, by orders curt,
To seek him straight, should either suffer hurt.

CCLXIII.

Still 'neath his roof he held them, keeping now
From vain expostulation. But, that night,
Gilbert the moment absent, Miriam's brow,
Temples, and cheek, turned suddenly as pale
As dark waves sundered by some surging prow ;
And with a cry that stifled seemed by fright,
And hands stretched out to help the eyes that fail,
She swooned upon the ground, and lay there pale.

CCLXIV.

By her he knelt, and on her bloodless face
Dashed water. Whereon opened she her eyes,
And gasping out 'twas needless to unlace
Her bodice now, for she should shortly rise,
Vowed, " It is but the strangeness of the place,
Some need of mountain air, of native skies.
Pray lift me up; it will be over soon ;
And tease not Gilbert with this foolish swoon.

CCLXV.

“You will not,—will you? ’Twould but harass more
His heart already harassed overmuch.
Promise me, Godfrid! Promise, I implore!”
And she besought him so with voice and touch,
And eyes with tearful pathos brimming o’er,
That he, but vulnerable stuff to such,
To give the asked-for pledge was feeling fain,
When, sudden, flashed suspicion through his brain.

CCLXVI.

Why this importunate violence of fear?
Why thus so anxiously his help discard?
And whence that swoon, minion of luxury’s sphere,
In one stern-nurtured as the hawk or pard?
“Miriam!” he said, “you ought not to be here!
For you have now another life to guard.
Answer me straight! You solitary bear
A sacred secret Gilbert ought to share!”

CCLXVII.

Again the paleness of the sky-peaks’ snow
Spread o’er her face an instant, ere it took
The crimson flush they take at sunset’s glow;
And she exclaimed, with supplicating look,
“You will not tell him? For he must not know!
Promise me, Godfrid! Oh! I could not brook
To clog his stroke just as we near Fate’s shore.
Can you not wait? You see ’twill soon be o’er!”

CCLXVIII.

“Knew you this, Miriam !” with a frown of pain
He asked her, “when you joined your voice with mine
To lead him back to Capri’s fawning main
From plunging seas of sanguinary brine ?”
“I did,” she said. “But was it not in vain ?
He guessed not why ; so let us not repine.
A few more hours, perhaps this very day,
Will end the strain. Swear you will not betray !”

CCLXIX.

That instant Gilbert entered, with a gaze
Which, fixed on far-off anguish, noted not
Pallor and pain in life’s familiar ways,
And in the world’s woe home distress forgot,
And, ere from horror’s dizzying amaze
Godfrid his thoughts could steady, from the spot,
Saying, “Come, Miriam ! slackens not the fight ;”
Had with her passed into the hurtling night.

CCLXX.

But when they had gone, and nought could Godfrid hear
Save hungry boom of death, then left alone
With his own self and formless ghosts of fear,
He fancied in each gust of battle blown
Over the roofs by echoing atmosphere,
To catch now Gilbert’s cry, now Miriam’s groan,
Or in the rattling panes and quaking street
To hear the scamper of their flying feet.

CCLXXI.

Till, spurred by fearful fancy, out he rushed
Into the night, resolved to drag them back,
If not too late, before their rashness, crushed
'Neath ruin's cliffs that now hung beetling black,
Nodding to fall, should lie for ever hushed
Amid the death-drifts of a treacherous track ;
And, deaf to Miriam's prayer, to Gilbert bare
The outrageous depths of suicide despair.

CCLXXII.

Stayed nor by shouts of warning, shrieks of fear,
Nor even wail of pain, he hurried on,
Through crowds that crying, " Fly ! the foe is here ! "
With panic feet came by, as swift were gone ;
Past barricades abandoned of their gear,
Along lone streets where not one pale lamp shone
To show the darkness, across open square
Where aimless bullets whistled through the air.

CCLXXIII.

The steadfast constellations in the sky
Had changed to comets, taking lengthening trail,
And all the stars seemed shooting. From on high
Downwards they plunged, grew giddy and turned pale,
Then, ere they fell, went out convulsively,
Scattering below black ærolitic hail ;
Whilst harassed Earth, in impotent despair,
With bellowing anger turned, and shelled the air.

CCLXXIV.

Onwards he pressed, unterrified by such,
For terror in his heart : his one sole thought,
Amid the crackling hurricane, to touch
The barrier where he knew that Gilbert fought ;
To search it, force his way to front, and clutch
The arm that should be sheltering her it brought
Full face to face with death, and shame the sire,
Since deaf the husband, from its jaws of fire.

CCLXXV.

But as he reached the point he strained for, lo !
Defence had vanished from it, and it stood
Void to the night, empty of friend and foe,
Horribly silent as some haunted wood.
Aghast he paused, then, turning quick to go,
Though without thought or purpose whither should
His feet next fly, 'gainst something lying prone
Across his path, was tripped, and forward thrown.

CCLXXVI.

He fell upon his hands in warm wet slop,
That splashed up in his face and neck, and sprawled
At first he scarce knew where, then lay atop
Of that which threw him ; but as back he crawled,
Placing one hand upon it for a prop,
Wherewith to raise himself, he felt, appalled,
A human body 'neath his touch, whose clothes
Got with his own entangled as he rose.

CCLXXVII.

Then, touch befooling sight to see, he thought
That in that tumbled heap he plain could trace
The figure of the combatant he sought,—
The arm, the hand, the head, the hair, the face.
And, fumbling in his pouch, he struck, distraught,
A fearful light, which, fluttered by the pace
At which he lowered it through the air, went out,
Leaving him once again in dark and doubt.

CCLXXVIII.

So this time carefully he knelt him down
Hard by the face ere striking light, which then
Flashed suddenly upon the visage brown
Of—no, not Gilbert! but, scanned close again,
Of a poor, low-browed, famished-featured clown,
Lying as he might lie 'mong reaping men
At mid-day meal; a face which, though unknown,
Through death seemed kindred and familiar grown.

CCLXXIX.

With thankful gasp he scrambled from his knees,
And, at that moment, the short match burnt out;
Yet not before he saw, quick as one sees
Landscape by lightning, dotted thick about,
Dead shapes of men, like felled but unbarked trees:
Whereat instinctively he gave a shout,
Listening for answer. But came no reply,
Of living groan or dying agony.

CCLXXX.

Then he paused silent, standing 'mong the dead,
Transfixed there by the scene which he could see
More plainly for the darkness, and by dread
Stamped on his brain for ever instantly.
When hark ! he thought, he heard a shuffling tread,
Then saw a shifting light that seemed to be Coming towards him slowly ; so he cried
Aloud once more, and a man's voice replied.

CCLXXXI.

And moving towards the light, the light towards him,
He met a wizened thing, blear, hunchback, spare,
One of wealth's pariahs, who, when night grows grim,
In to-day's offal for to-morrow's fare
Grope with a pointed stick and lantern dim.
Him foul, with fairest words, he begged to bear
The link before him, so that one by one
He might the corpses scan, omitting none.

CCLXXXII.

Then picking 'mong the dead his way, he bent
Over each body, and with dread renewed
At each fresh trial, while that other lent
Careless his light, the wan blank faces viewed,
Fearfully searching every lineament,
Lest death had chance the well-known look imbued
With its own strangeness ; and, at times, again
Stooping, to make more certain of his ken.

CCLXXXIII.

Some lay upon their backs, their final gaze
Upturned, in hope that Heaven rescinded woe ;
Some on their faces, since that Earth's bad days
Must end, they deemed, in cruel Hell below.
Some, cuddled up, heavy and hard to raise,
Their arms had folded round their heads, as though
They had seen too much in life, nor wanted e'en,
If more still was, to see or to be seen.

CCLXXXIV.

These, scranny wrinkles showed and silvery hair,
The remnant of whose life, one would have thought,
Was scarce worth dying for ; the next were fair,
Young-faced, and rounded, with lips finely wrought,
Bloodless, with blood bedabbled. Two there were,
That froze his soul, when first their forms he caught ;—
Women, and comely both, though of plain folk ;
And one, whose hair 'trothed hand had loved to stroke.

CCLXXXV.

But terror found not what it sought, and thence,
Hastily dropping guerdon, straight he fled,
With horror at his heels, each separate sense
Sharpened to keen acquaintance with the dead.
Nor paused he till he reached the portal whence
His steps had started ; mounting, with new dread,
To his own hearth, lest haply he should there
Find waiting summons, to make doubt despair.

CCLXXXVI.

But none had sought him ; so again he hied
Down to the street, and at the doorway met
One of his messengers. "What news?" he cried.
"Alas!" exclaimed the other, "I can get
Tidings no more. I swear that by their side
I stayed as might their shadow ; but, beset
By numbers, we all fled, they last and loth ;
And in the jostling flight I lost them both.

CCLXXXVII.

"Where stand they now, I know not ; but when I
Last saw them, still they lived." "Then, go ! straight go," Gasped Godfrid. "Find where shrills the rallying cry,
Where steadiest the defence, and let me know."
Then off the other sped ; and o'er the sky,
Escorted by light gales, spread morning's glow,
Not to awake the city, but to sight
Bare the black ruins of that sleepless night.

CCLXXXVIII.

But day brought horror of its own, that threw
Night's darkest deeds in shade. Supreme despair,
Steeling its soul to craven vengeance, slew
Weaponless hands, limbs tottering, age-blanchèd hair ;
And ere the stroke of mid-day Godfrid knew
The Hostages were dead ! Within the lair
Where wild beasts had encaged them, these had shown
That meagre mercy soon to be their own.

CCLXXXIX.

For even now from Vengeance' taloned feet
The jesses had been loosed, and up it soared,
Then swooping, pounced upon its quarry sweet,
And with its beak the fluttering entrails gored.
Rage tracked down fear, twisting from street to street ;
Suspected innocence in vain implored ;
Hate could but see to smite, and kill its way,
Deeming none slain while more remained to slay.

CCXC.

Some came and courted death, that blood might be
The martyr's seed of brotherhood, and some,
Who easy might have fled, disdained to flee,
Yelled out their watchwords vain, and then fell dumb
Under a waste of bullets. "This is he !"
Some cried to save themselves ; and others, "Come !
This way a batch of shivering wretches lurk !"
Pandars to slaughter's wanton handiwork.

CCXCI.

Serpent-like spite its coiled-up grudges wreaked,
Now with vicarious venom, hissing out
The names of those whose heedlessness had piqued
Its prone self-love ; and wrath, too hot to doubt,
Too quick to question, straight its bayonet streaked
With blood whose only crime had been to scout
The enticements of the wanton, or withstand
The slimy friendship of the filching band.

CCXCII.

Order, disorder having by the throat,
Dealt death disorderly ; Law lawless grew,
And Justice saw but heard not. Mercy smote,
Smiling, its dupes, and whom she smote she slew.
Religion, rough confounding sheep with goat,
Speared suppliants on her altar-steps, or drew
Their clinging bodies forth, and 'gainst church wall
Propped them, fired blank, then laughed to see them fall

CCXCIII.

And Godfrid from blood-weltering street to street,
Moved dizzy with dismay ; wandering to find
Some trace of the lost dear ones' fate or feet.
Vainly : for nought now lived, before, behind,
Save doubt, distraction, and despair complete.
Death lay too thick for even Love to wind
Among his heaps and recognise her own ;
And warm-veined Hope stood smitten into stone.

CCXCIV.

For all his grief, he could not go and seek Help from Olympia. That too selfish seemed,
And as though strength should lean upon the weak.
Now, too, he felt as though his own hands streamed
With blood of the slain Hostages. How speak
With her of that ? Better she prayed, and dreamed,
In her safe cloister, of some far world's bliss,
Than shared the unutterable woe of this !

CCXCV.

Blood-dripping passed the day. But with the night,
Though swollen-handed Vengeance sheathed not yet
Its victim-hunting blade, another sight
Made it awhile its fell pursuit forget.
Mountains of smoke, touched with the lurid light
Of dawning conflagration, rose up jet,
Then flattened o'er the city, like a pall
Spread for the cannon-booming funeral.

CCXCVI.

At first men stared and wondered whence it came,
And some assured them, "Here!" and others, "There!"
But vain to hark to guessing tongue of fame,
Since smoke puffed upwards, here, there, everywhere,
Followed by volumes of fuliginous flame,
At first as colourless as sunshine's glare,
Then waxing fulvous, as forked fire made head,
'Gainst its own fumes; last, sanguinary red.

CCXCVII.

Pavement and portal, tall-peaked roof and spire,
Column, and pinnacle, and frontage high,
Glowed in a furnace of all-circling fire.
There was no firmament 'twixt earth and sky:
All was one crimson glare, one oven dire
Of hungry-throbbing heat, that would not die,
Nor dwindle, till it had at length consumed
All its assimilating walls enwombed.

CCXCVIII.

And still denunciation's ravening tongue
Ran through the ways ; now indicating him,
Ay, and now her, now those, as having sprung
The fiery mine, long laid in cellar dim,
And plied the torch. Whereat these straight were flung,
With loud protesting voice and pleading limb,
Into the hell they had lit, that yawned and towered,
And by their own vindictive flames devoured.

CCXCIX.

Some, of the piles they had ignited, made
A final fortress, and, there hemmed in fast
By their own desperate burning barricade,
Kept firing on their foes unto the last,
From high scorched perch ; then, swaying as it swayed,
They fell in with the falling walls, and passed
Into engulfing darkness, whence upshot
Fresh smoke-clouds, choking-thick and blinding-hot.

CCC.

One band sardonic was there, that had ta'en
Cover within that Palace where the sound
Of purple pomp and pleasure used to reign,
And laugh, and cup, and compliment went round ;
Where venal on chaste beauty smiled disdain,
Where candour's dismal prophecies were drowned
In boastful songs, and lacquey-liveried slave
Slow dug with fawning hands an Empire's grave.

CCCI.

Here met they at the close, ironic crew,
Children of joyless labour, pledged to joy
In this last hour, a lustful-chosen few,
Defiant man, bold woman, shameless boy,
Whose carnal souls no longing ever knew
Save to clutch gross indulgence for a toy ;
And, having fired its shell, they sate within,
And held a feast of revelry and sin.

CCCII.

There they remained, swilling wealth's foaming wine,
And howling unclean ditties in the pause
Of demon kisses apeing love divine,
Till nigh upon them closed fire's red-hot jaws,
Quick-darting tongue and motions serpentine.
Then out they rushed, the watchwords of their Cause
Half shrieked, half belched, and sank in one foul heap,
Riddled with balls, to deadly-drunken sleep.

CCCIII.

Dawn through the pitchy wrack fought hard for life,
Though still the flames, with appetite unspent,
Dispassionate umpire of the civic strife,
Averse from either litigant, seemed bent
On leaving both with nought but ruin rife,
A dual beggary its arbitrament ;
Devoting with just wrath could neither check,
Rule and rebellion to a common wreck.

CCCIV.

Dazed with despair, and able now no more
To proffer help, where help was mockery deemed,
Godfrid returned, as time towards mid-day wore,
To his own hearth, entering like one that dreamed.
And as he walked, blank-gazing, o'er the floor,
He suddenly espied a scroll that seemed
Placed on the table to attract his eye ;
And seizing it, he uttered sanguine cry.

CCCV.

For 'twas from Miriam, and it said, " I send
This line by messenger,—a last farewell ;
For we are face to face now with the end.
How yet we live unscathed, but Heaven can tell ;
Brought finally to bay, our ranks defend
The routed Commune's topmost citadel,
At Belleville, compassed round by foe that gives
Nothing but death to anything that lives.

CCCVI.

" Seek for our bodies, claim them if you may,
Gilbert's and mine, and for the love you bore
Unto us both, across the bright blue bay
Row them yourself, dear, back to Capri's shore,
And within hearing of the murmuring spray
Make us a grave ; and see you strew it o'er
Sometimes with flowers from Tuoro Grande's brow.
I never loved you, brother, more than now."

CCCVII.

Straight rushed he forth, conspiring hope and dread
Lending joint wings. But as he touched the street,
He thought he heard his name by some one said,
And, close behind, the sound of hastening feet.
And turning, 'twas Olympia! "Oh! not dead!"
"Not dead!" she cried, with rapture that was sweet
Unto his ears e'en in that bitter hour,
Asserting mid worst woe love's lasting power!

CCCVIII.

"Dead? No, dear love!" he with prompt lips replied,
And arms instinctively outstretched to fold
Her form to his, then sudden to his side
Dropped mindful, empty, reverently cold.
"But why, Olympia! deemed you I had died?"
He asked, in accents tender, but less bold.
"Because you did not come to me," she said,
"And so I thought you must indeed be dead."

CCCIX.

Again love's swift electric currents ran
From the heart's battery to the moving hands,
Tingling to fondle. But, man checked by man,
Flesh paused, the noble serf of soul's commands.
"I did not come to you, because you can
Do nothing more," he said. "Infuriate bands
Nor see nor spare. I felt, mid rage like theirs,
That you, poor child, were better at your prayers."

CCCX.

“For me there is one office left, and then
I to your Convent will repair. For see !
Gilbert with Miriam in defeat’s last den
Are close shut in, and from it cannot flee,
E’en if they would ; their comrades desperate men,
Who nor to earth nor Heaven would bend the knee,
And whom their foes, now biding Vengeance’ tryst,
Would slay, if clung they to the skirt of Christ !”

CCCXI.

“Then let us go there straight !” she said, “and save !
It was for this Madonna sent me here.
Can we not start at once ?” But he, the brave,
The unshrinking, cried with pallid lips of fear,
“My child ! I cannot take you to your grave !
You must not come. I hold you far too dear.”
“Not go where you go !” solemnly she said :
“I must live safe, you perilled,—perhaps dead !”

CCCXII.

“O Godfrid ! I have lived without you long,
And shall live ever thus, while yet I live ;
But ’twas Heaven’s constant promise made me strong,
That when earth’s refuse should have run the sieve,
And nought remained but spirit, for the wrong
Love here hath suffered, love beyond would give Eternal compensation ! If it be
You now face death, you face it must with me !”

CCCXIII.

“Come then !” he said, fear now extinct. “Come quick !
Each step is precious !” Then up streets they wound,
Where slaughter of its own work had grown sick,
And dreadful silence followed dreadful sound.
Men’s doors were closed ; but now and then the click
Of latch was heard, and head, sly glancing round,
Protruded for a moment, quickly then
Withdrawn, and latch dropped noiselessly again.

CCCXIV.

But as they got up higher, barricade,
Empty, except of the unnoticed dead
That lay mid splintered rifles, broken blade,
Grew thicker, and the ways more blocked to tread.
And shortly, hushed battalions, on parade,
But with accoutrements splashed foul and red,
As though through blood they had waded, held the place,
By moody cannon flanked, that gazed on space.

CCCXV.

And many a hand was lifted in salute,
Returned by Godfrid, though intended less
For him than her, who walked meek-eyed and mute,
Her senses cloistered in her sober dress,
And lips in prayer composedly resolute,
Close at his side ; and as the martial press
Waxed denser, one whose garb bespoke command,
Stayed them, and said, with deprecating hand :

CCCXVI.

"'Twere best to go no further, sir! You stray
Beyond our lines, and desperadoes hold
What is beyond. At any moment may
The bugles flourish and the drum be rolled.
We shall attack at once. So turn back, pray!"
And others, crowding round, like story told.
But he, "I thank you, gentlemen! Withal,
You see my badge; I but obey its call."

CCCXVII.

So these, once more saluting, let them pass;
And by streets staircased, intricate, they came
To where the remnant of the rebel mass
Waited behind last rampart, pledged to shame
Ungenerous Fortune, deaf to shame, alas!
For her desertion, and from juster Fame
Extort the avowal, if unfit to live,
Their brave death makes vindictiveness forgive!

CCCXVIII.

Just as they reached the very topmost crown
Of the rude citadel, and came in view
Of its defences,—in the lower town,
From which but now they clomb, a bugle blew,
And upwards whizzed a shell, then hurtled down.
Swiftly to arms the loitering victims flew,
And Godfrid Gilbert saw, amid the chase,
Hurrying with Miriam o'er the open space.

CCCXIX.

Fast as can foot be lifted from the ground,
Unheeding e'en Olympia, straight he ran,
Shouting their names before him. At the sound
They halted and looked back ; while hastening van,
Urged on by hastening rear, of battle, wound
Past them, defiance now its only plan ;
Leaving them stranded, as by scudding wind
Are hesitating leaves left loose behind.

CCCXX.

"What do you here?" asked Gilbert. "This is not
The place, the hour for mercy. O fly ! fly !"
"I fly !" cried Godfrid. "Man ! you have forgot
Your manhood utterly. 'Tis you, not I,
Who must be dragged, if needs be, from the spot ;
For, by Love's sovran rights ! she shall not die !
Do you not know she bears within her womb
Its pledge, you seek to cradle in the tomb !"

CCCXXI.

Was it a mortal bullet from the foe,
Or only Godfrid's words, pierced Gilbert's brain ?
Pallid he turned, and staggered back as though
He a farewell had made of life and pain.
But propped by Miriam promptly, "Is it so ?"
Aghast he murmured. "Tell me,—tell me plain !"
"It is," she said. "But what untimely power Brings you here, Godfrid, in this final hour ?"

CCCXXII.

"It is not final," he replied. "Now quick !
Gilbert, be calm, and do as I shall bid !
See you yon curving wall of crumbling brick ?
Turn, when it turns it right, then, following, thrird
A twisting alley where stone stairs stand thick,
Until you reach an archway almost hid
By the contiguous dwellings. Once when there,
You should be safe. Then to my roof repair.

CCCXXIII.

"Here is a pass, the safest you can wear,
'Twill serve for both." And from his arm he took
The Red Cross brassard rapidly, and ere
Either could speak, the badge began to hook
Round Gilbert's sleeve, who still with horror's stare
Stood as transfixed. But Miriam cried, "Look ! look !
See what he does. He helps us both to fly,
And, unprotected, he remains to die !"

CCCXXIV.

"Hush ! Miriam ! 'Tis not so," he sternly said,
"And if it were, what then ! I bid you flee !
Th' unborn shall not be mingled with the dead !"
Then gazing round, he saw and bade them see
A Sister bending o'er the upraised head
Of dying form. "She will suffice for me :
'Tis my Olympia, and her garb will sue
For both of us, as this for both of you."

CCCXXV.

“Swear you are safe!” said Gilbert, “then, we go!”
“I swear it! Now, farewell! One moment more
May prove too late. For hear you not the foe
Firing more closely, and the rising roar
Of troops advancing? But first,—see you!—throw
Your arms away; put on this cloak I wore
Expressly for your need. There! now depart;
Delay, and it may be too late to start.”

CCCXXVI.

But Miriam fought for one embrace, and then
They were gone! safe passed beyond the shattered wall.
And Godfrid, gazing round with rapid ken,
Beheld Olympia, still to misery's call
Lending her ear, deaf to the yells of men
Maddened with battle, deaf to cannon's brawl,
And murmuring for pale lips, which 'neath her lay,
Prayers long unsaid, prayers now they could not say.

CCCXXVII.

Towards her he hastened, and below her saw
That timely face which, when they dubbed him spy,
Had pleaded 'gainst the rabble's lawless law!
“Alas!” she said, “I fear that he must die!
He spoke my tongue.” “In truth, he ne'er will draw
Life's breath again! He is dead! Now must we fly;
For we too should be gone. 'Twere vain to wait,
When upon mercy wrath hath clanged the gate.”

CCCXXVIII.

“And have you saved them?” “Yes! my badge they wear,—
Enough for both. Now must I cling to you,
My safeguard ever!” “Welcome! They who spare,
Or slay the one, must spare or slay the two,”
With joy she cried; “so straight hence let us fare,
If nought be left for pity’s touch to do.
But lest that any fail to understand
We two are one,—there! Godfrid! take my hand!”

CCCXXIX.

He took it. “See, Olympia! we must make
To yon far corner, for the opening where
Gilbert and Miriam went.” But as he spake,
Shouts of fierce exultation rent the air,
And swarming in wherever foot could take,
Or head force, passage to the rebel square,
The storming files of vengeance came apace,
Death in their hands and fury in their face.

CCCXXX.

Too few to guard each passage, and thus ta’en
In rear and flank, the rebel band faced round,
Their one sole thought to slay before being slain,
And with lowered points fired blank across the ground,
At foes that, blind as they, flashed deadly rain
Direct on all their level barrels found
Standing erect; and, when these fell, to glut
Ire too soon fed, made mangled mounds their butt.

CCCCXXI.

And Godfrid had but time,—at last!—to fling
His arms around the form he had loved so well,
Thinking to save, and she to him to cling,
When, 'twixt the madness of the two they fell :
He pierced by ball that fought for faiths of old,
She by their shaft who 'gainst old faiths rebel ;
Albeit so close was this their first, last troth,
One well-aimed bullet would have served for both.

CCCCXXII.

Thus were they found, when, rummaging among
Mixed heaps of slain, the victors came to save
The corpses of their brethren, ere was flung
The refuse in one contumelious grave.
And seeing that one who wore Christ's habit, clung,
Even in death, to form so worldly brave,
They touched them not, but prayed that priest or nun
Would come and say what meet 'twere to be done.

CCCCXXIII.

Then quickly from the Convent thither sped
The reverend Mother, with two daughters dear ;
Who, when she saw this bridal of the dead,
Weeping, commanded, " Put them on one bier,
And bear them after me with gentle tread."
And straight she sent for him who many a year
To them had been Heaven's helpmate in that place,
A venerable man, with prayer-lit face.

CCCXXXIV.

To him, in hearing of them all, she told
The story she herself had learnt when first,
Six brief weeks gone, Olympia joined their fold,
And next, how Godfrid, aiding her, had nursed
The wounded she with deeper balm consoled ;
But from their ears withholding not the worst,—
His strange sad unbelief, which still had kept
The pair apart, till one in death they slept.

CCCXXXV.

The agèd pastor, thuswise as she spake,
In silence listened, and then slowly said :
“ My children ! these two souls, for Truth’s pure sake,
Divided were, since Faith, in him, was dead.
Who knows ? perchance it did in death awake :
And ’twas to save the lost Christ breathed and bled.
Doubt watered by such prayers must somewhere bud ;
And see ! he hath the baptism of blood.

CCCXXXVI.

“ Therefore I dare not say Christ vainly died
Even for him. And since the twain would lie,
Methinks, at Spiaggiascura side by side,
Heaven will not earth’s infirmity deny.
So let us there one grave for both provide,
In consecrated ground beneath the sky.
She needs no epitaph ; so let his plea,
Dilcxit multum, sole inscription be ! ”

CCCXXXVII.

So ye who go, half guided by my song,
To Spiaggiascura, there a grave will find,
To which the waves make music all day long,
And wherein sleep the gentlest of their kind,
Sheltered for ever now from hap of wrong.
And, can it be our mortal causes find
Immortal consequence beyond the tomb,
He either shares her bliss, or she his doom.

CCCXXXVIII.

Enter the little chapel, as you pass,
That still stands shimmering in the fragrant air,
Though she who loved it is not there, alas !
And, if you can, kneel down and say a prayer.
Then seek, without, a grave amid the grass,
With that inscription carved in marble fair ;
And falling tears will sound, if wept for woe,
Sweeter than summer showers to those below.

CCCXXXIX.

And should it be the springtime, go at morn
Straight up the dewy dell, until you gain
Spot you will know, and from the blossoming thorn
That on the streamlet showers its snow-white rain,
Pluck branch, and just as from the tree 'twas torn,
Lay it at their feet. And, lastly, will you deign
Lend one kind thought, be such prayer not too bold,
To him who, stammering, hath their story told.

CCCXL.

Gilbert and Miriam live, and strive to cope
With grief in tutoring a baby mind,
Named after Godfrid, that is taught to hope
For common happiness to all Mankind.
Surely, a blameless creed ; for we must grope
Towards light, if only seeing that we are blind ;
And, despite Human Tragedy whate'er,
Hope still waves torch, and beckons to despair.

CCCXLI.

But whether the unsetting day shall rise
For which the downcast weep, the sanguine pine,
Or, but as hitherto, in fitful skies,
Dawn must to dark, fair must to foul decline,—
For gentle hearts and steadfast-gazing eyes
Thou, thou at least, wilt never cease to shine,
Mid wreck of things that were, or things that are,
O Love ! undying Love ! eternal Star !

THE END.

340 7

104 UNIVERSITY of CALIFORNIA

LOS ANGELES
LIBRARY

UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA AT LOS ANGELES

THE UNIVERSITY LIBRARY

This book is DUE on the last date stamped below

Form L-9
20m-1, '42(8519)

LOS ANGELES
LIBRARY

UC SOUTHERN REGIONAL LIBRARY FACILITY

AA 000 364 717 9

